The Local Paper.

"It ought to be, as it usually is, on the living room table along with the family Bible and the farm magazine. It is the story-teller of the neighborhood, and it deals in a simple, friendly fashion with the doings of the neighbors. The man who puts it together week after week overlooks Bill's failings while living, and says only kindly things about Bill when he crosses the dark river, still owing for five years' back subscription. It is an inveterate gossip about the neighborhood, but its gossip is seldom tinged with anything save friendliness; it leads us, week in and week out, to have a little better feeling toward those about us. Its coming breaks monotony of the week and furnishes many new subjects for table talk and evening conversation. If it reminds us of death and taxes it also tells us of the new baby over at Olson's and the new silo going up down on the Creek. It is a friend who tells us, in plain black and white, just how friendly and good a lot of folks our own great good fortune has placed us among. Do we remember our neighbor-editor with a hand-grip that leaves something crinkly in his hand, good for a hat for the editor's wife or a pair of shoes for the editor's boy? It might pay to experiment along this line and to watch the result.—Farm, Stock & Home.
