CLASSES IN SOCIETY.

A Demonstration That There Are No Such Social Distinctions in America.

"A very brief essay might be written," said my philosophical friend, "on class distinctions in society, after the manner of the historical chapter on snakes in Ireland, by simply saying there are no classes in American society."

"Why, Astor," I replied, "and Jay Gould and Vanderbilt." Well, he said, "Jay Gould is simply the maker of $75,000,000. He began as poor as the poorest man on the streets of Astor, Astor, and Tilden."

As for Astor, he inherited from his grandfather, who was no better off than any other German emigrant. So you observe the three names that you give comprise one man who made his money himself, one the son of a poor man, and the third the grandson of a poor emigrant.

Everybody Knows It. When you have Rich, Salt Rheum, Galls, or Skin eruptions of any kind, and the like, the only way to get rid of them is to use Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People.

THE DAVENPORT FAMILY.

What the Scattered Members of the Group of Actors Are Doing.

The success secured by Fanny Davenport in Sardinia's "Fedora" gave renewed brilliancy to the name and fame of the Davenport family.

Her father, the late E. L. Davenport, after his proud Boston relatives had scolded him and ridiculed him and vainly sought him to keep still, ran away to Providence and became a partner in the firm of Madson, Squere & Company with a young man in the name of Fanny Davenport.

She was a girl of remarkable character, having reached almost as high success as her husband did in a repertory embracing the whole range of dramatic art. She is now a gentle, sweet-mannered, black-haired lady in the life of her profession and proud of her children. She was born in a green room, as it were, her mother being an actress and her father being Frederick Vining, so long manager of the Hay Market Theatre, London.

Lester Wallack and Mrs. John Hay were the Davenport's only cousins. Of the ten children six are living and all are attached to their mother, as they were to their father, by the ties of an uncommon love. Fanny was carried on the stage when a baby, as the Davenport babies have been; but one day when she was fifteen and in school, the little girl who was to play Emma Terrans in "The Serious Family," was ill and Mr. Davenport said: "What under heaven can we do?"

"Let Fanny take it," said Mrs. Davenport.

"She can't do it," said her father.

"Yes, I'll teach her," said the mother, and little Fanny received the delightful message while struggling with a hateful sun in fractions. She ran home, played the little part, succeeded fully. In an afternoon her father was on the stage. The second child, Blanche, the opera singer, known to the world as Bianca la Blanche. She has been singing in Italy this winter—in Milan. Florence is a resident of Philadelphia, is married, and has never followed the stage for a moment. The fourth surviving daughter, May, was a child actress with her parents at the Boston Museum and afterwards played with Fanny, but she left the stage when she married Willie Seymour, stage manager of the Boston Museum. The eldest boy, Edgar, is a well-known actor in the city.

He looked twenty years ago—is a handsome young fellow twenty two years. He is supporting Mr. Curtis ("Sam'l o' Posen") this season. The youngest boy, Harry, seventeen years old now, is with his mother, as Mr. Davenport is.

LATE MINNEAPOLIS NEWS.

A little past midnight, Officer Lane met a man on Eighth avenue northeast, near Sibey street. He was dressed like a lumberman, and was carrying a sack filled with something, a tin pan and a shovel.

The officer confronted him, and the man protested he could not talk English, dropping his load. He proposed to get an interpreter and started off. The officer, mistrusting that something was wrong followed a short distance, but returned to the sack, and upon examining it, found it to be a small pouch containing on top a lot of old clothing, but beneath a large number of letters and postal cards. Meanwhile the man had disappeared and the officer brought the mail to police headquarters. How the man came in possession of the mail is a mystery. It is supposed a train robbery must have occurred somewhere, but nothing is known respecting that. However, the letters do not appear to have been tampered with. The postmaster has been sent for and is at this writing on his way to police headquarters. He may be able to throw some light upon the matter. Beyond question the man was a crook, and had disguised himself as a lumberman to avert suspicion, and his pretended ignorance of the English language was a clever subterfuge. The mail is mostly from Portland and from all cities along the line of the Northern Pacific railway. The man got away with one large bundle, which he carried under his arm, and the authorities believe it to have been another lot of letters, perhaps of great value. The man was taken from the regular Northern Pacific train which arrived from Portland at nine o'clock last evening.

A farmer, whose name is not known, but who lives 125 miles from Minneapolis, attended Pence opera house last night. In coming out of the theater a thief cut out his pants pocket and stole a pocket-book containing a check on the First National bank of Chicago for $25.
