

SONG OF THE GIBBET.

[As recited by Mr. Lawrence Barrett in his new play, "The King's Pleasure."] Louis XI. was accustomed to hanging criminals in groups in the forest.

PRETTY ROSAMOND VILLARS.

"The King and the Palace of Diamonds are Nigh at Hand." "Why Rosa, what ails you to-day, child? You are striking flits instead of sharps."

Rosamond Villars pushed back her stool, thereby overturning the music-book with a crash over the keys, burst into tears and hid her flushed face in the great "how-pot" of roses that old Alexander Piret always kept on the lamp-shelf of his piano.

"No!" she cried. "No! I am not sick—and I am not afeared; but, ah! I am so very—very—wretched! And please, M. Piret, I don't know what to do!"

"She looked very pretty, this 17-year-old girl, as she lifted her long-lashed hazel eyes to the old music master's withered face."

"My child, my child," he said, "I don't know what is the matter. Tell the old father. Confide in me, petite, for I had never for these when our lessons should be complete."

"You have heard from Cecil, then?" Rosamond's face lighted up through her tears. "But, oh! it is thinking of him that makes me so miserable!"

"My faith! that is strange. But still you have not told me. Go on. What is the grief that brings the diamond drops into the eyes?"

"It's because we are so poor," sighed Rosamond. "And they can't wait, papa and mamma, until I get that situation to sing in St. Marcel's choir to earn a little money. The rent is due, and the landlady has been here twice. Oh! if you only knew what a hard, insulting man he is. And there are so many debts—petty, gnawing, gnawing debts—and papa says that it's my fault that he has to wear a shabby coat and do without the glass of claret at his dinner and the expensive cigars and poor mamma says nothing, but she cries and looks waxy and heart-broken. Oh! what can I do? What ought I do? I wish I knew some one to advise me rightly."

"But only wait, my child," said the old man, eddily wringing his brows into the shape of the letter T. "How is it your fault that they are poor?"

"Because of Mr. Richardson, who wants to marry me," confessed Rosamond, coloring and shrinking involuntarily. "He is rich, but he is so old, nearly old as you are, M. Piret. And his hair is grizzled, and his teeth are so white and even that I know they are not real. But he lives in a great house, and says he will provide for papa and mamma and all if only I will be his wife. It is not strange he should want me, when there are so many others, nearer his own age, who would be glad to accept him?"

"But, petite, you are engaged to my son, Cecil, who has gone to the gold-fields of Australia to toil for you."

Rosamond's color deepened, her lashes drooped, as she played nervously with the little jet cross that hung at her throat.

"They think I ought to break my engagement to M. Piret. They think Cecil will never return—or, if at all, not for years! They say I ought not to wait for his uncertain fortunes."

M. Piret looked keenly at her. "And what do you think, Rose-of-the-World?" asked he. "For, after all, it is your decision which is to settle this matter."

"Oh, M. Piret," faltered the poor girl, "what an I do to do? It is hard to see those I love suffer, when one word spoken by me would lift the iron grip of poverty from their hearts and lives. Papa says I am selfish even to hesitate a minute, and that I should do help me—do counsel me!"

"It might be selfish," said the old man, slowly, and still scanning her mobile features; "it might be selfish, Rosamond, if it was your own happiness alone that hung in the scale. But there is another person who is vitally and nearly concerned—my son Cecil!"

Rosamond wrung her hands, while the sparkling tears coursed down her cheeks in torrents.

"It is so hard!" she cried passionately. "Yet," said M. Piret, "I would not attempt through any feeble eloquence of mine to bias your decision. If your own heart does not direct you aright no argument of mine could do so. Go home, poor little Rosamond. Sleep on it—pray over it, and then decide as you will. To-morrow I will hear your ultimatum."

"You will kiss me good-by, just as you used, Papa Piret," pleaded Rosamond, lifting her wet eyes to his face.

"I will kiss you good-by, just as I used, Rose-of-the-World," said he, and then he kissed her on the forehead.

Rosamond Villars' home offered no particular attractions upon that rainy June night. At best it was but one floor, in a dreary house which concealed its character under the imposing title of "French flats."

The fire sulked; the chimney smoked; the faded carpet looked comfortable and worn; the table was spread with no attempt at the little refinements which make eating and drinking rank among the fine arts. Rosamond thought that the remains of yesterday's Irish stew, weak tea, and baker's bread had never seemed less appetizing than to-night. Mr. Villars, one of those pretentious artists who fancy that because their pictures do not sell the whole world must be in league against them, sat moodily beside the lamp, his feet stretched out to the exclusion of every one else; his hands deep in his pockets. Mrs. Villars, a thin female, who went through the world with a chronic white and a perpetual face-ache, involving a flannel bandage at most seasons of the year, was sighing over the pickle-jar as, one by one, she speared its contents with a fork.

"I'd almost as soon die as to live on this way," sighed Mrs. Villars. "Sit down to your dinner, Rosamond—such as it is. I'd have liked to set a good joint of meat before you, but the butcher says, up and down, as plain as a yoke-staff, that until that back bill is settled he'll trust no farther."

With an apprehensive glance toward the unappreciated devotee of art, Rosamond sat down and tried to sip a little of the cold, smoky tea. But every mouthful seemed to choke her.

"Oh, mother," she said, "I can't eat! Do mother, help me! Advise me a little. Remember, you yourself were young once—perhaps had two lovers like me!"

"My dear," coaxed Mrs. Villars, "I'm sure your duty is plain enough. About your inclinations I don't pretend to say."

"And my duty?"

"Is to obey your parents and marry Lorenzo Richardson."

"Then I will, mamma," said Rosamond, convulsively swallowing a great lump in her throat. "I'll marry Mr. Richardson. You can tell him so to-morrow when he comes."

"That's my own dutiful girl!" cried Mrs. Villars, lifting his knife and half turning round. "I thought you'd come to your senses after a while. Cheer up, old lady!"

to his wife, "there's bright days ahead for us yet, and all owing to our little Rosamond."

But at dawn, while the faint starlight and the pink flush of coming sunrise struggled together, Rosamond Villars came to her mother's bedside, pale as a ghost.

"Mother, I can't do it!" cried she. "No, I can't marry that old man when all my heart is given to Cecil Piret!"

Old Alexander Piret met the girl at the door with a troubled, inquiring countenance, but Rosamond ran sobbing into his arms.

"If it was the king, with a palace full of diamonds, I couldn't give up Cecil for him. Papa Piret, I'll marry Cecil if I have to scrub floors for a living!" breathlessly uttered she.

"So, so, my little girl. Bien, it is well. And now for the news I kept back yesterday," said the old Frenchman. "Cecil has made his fortune. He is even now on his way back to the United States. I don't know much about the affairs of those golden islands, but it seems Cecil was wonderfully lucky in his choice of land. And when he comes back, my Rose-of-the-World, he will make you a richer woman than half a dozen of yonder bald-headed old Richmonds! Courage, my love! The king and the palace of diamonds are nigh at hand!"

"Oh, M. Piret!" gasped Rosamond, "is it really true?"

"As the blessed gospel, my daughter." "But why didn't you tell me yesterday?"

"Because, Rosamond, I saw that yesterday your little nature trembled in the balance. I left it to yourself and your own soul. If you had elected to marry the old suitor your parents favored I should have had no pity in my heart. But God be thanked you are true to your own loyal heart. And my Cecil would have been a rich man this day if he never had seen the golden shores of Australia!"

And when Rosamond Villars was the wife of a millionaire her father and mother were forced to resign to her own instinct had led her right.

And Papa Piret, released from the daily drudgery of music lessons, was, perhaps, next to the groom, the happiest man in all the wide world.
