Hunted Down. Special to the Globe. Oct. 13.—An Argus special from Bottineau, near the Manitoba border, gives an account of a lively chase by the Manitoba, Dakota and United States officials of a criminal fugitive from Manitoba named Rev. W. H. Wyatt Hunneth, who smuggled across the line two teams and other property to the value of $2,000. This fall the title to which, it is alleged, did not rest in him. His trail was struck by Collector Thompson and other officials about fifteen miles from Bottineau. Following it up about twelve miles further they sighted the game and both parties increased their speed. The fugitive, crossing the boundary into Manitoba, the Manitoba sheriff now thought he had the game bagged, but the fugitive was not to be taken and was back in Dakota again soon. Here the chase became hot and exciting. The man of hot cloth with his cavalcade of men on a dead run and the pursuing minions of the law following close after. Wild shouts and yells and the crash of breaking weapons and the rattling of bullets were heard. Suddenly the fugitive halted and stepped in front of his wagon drawing a rifle upon his pursuers and warning them not to come nearer. In the course of the parley some of the officers got under him and disarmed him, and under command of Col. Thompson the fugitive was taken to Bottineau, as captives. Where the law will take its course with them.

It was in '75, I was then conductor of the day express, running on the Savannah, Florida and Western road, and was in charge of the machinery, you know, and when we left a station and I had collected tickets, I went to climb out to the engine and sat with Bill Stevens, the engineer. One day we left Savannah, followed a half an hour later by a freight train that was going to the north without a stop. Between Savannah and Dupont we had but three stops to make, and we were in the engine about an hour and twenty minutes by a hot box, and when we pulled into the station, the engine was around the curve, less than a quarter of a mile behind us. The next stopping place was Homerville and we were at a rattling pace when we were making up the time. After the train was well under way, I climbed out to the engine and sat talking to Bill Stevens, the engineer, but we were slowly gaining on it and expected that we would be well ahead of it when we reached the next station. We were just about to get out of the cab window when I was startled by an exclamation from the engineer, looking at his hand clutching the throttle, looking straight ahead. Following his gaze he was horrified to see that the freight train was burning and had fallen, leaving a black heap of twisted iron and twisted steel, and deep stear at us. My first thought was to stop the train, but I knew that the freight train had already started on its way, and on the train before it could be signaled. It was sure death to stop, but there was barely a possible chance of clearing the creek by the time the freight train was a full head of steam. I turned to Bill to order him to throw open the throttle when he suddenly stepped to the cab door and sprang down the embankment, the fireman followed suit and I was left alone. It wasn't a pleasant situation to be in, but there were 300 lives in my charge and if they were sacrificed I concluded to take my chances with them. I saw my hand clutching the throttle and I pulled the throttle wide open, and shutting my eyes sank on to the seat of the cab in a heap, expecting every second to see my last. The engine shot like an arrow. After crawling on the seat fully five minutes without the expected crash coming, I stepped up courageously to my feet and looking out of the window I found that we were flying through the country fully six miles an hour. I was not a little surprised when I saw that the freight train was successful; we had jumped across the burnt bridge and had done it so quickly and neatly that not one of the passengers was the wiser. The danger that had menaced them. I stopped the train and backed down to the bridge. The freight train was on the other side of the river in consequence of a draw bar breaking. Stevens, the engineer, reported that while the train was passing he found a pile of rocks. When the passengers found out what I had done they took a collection of money to amount to $2,500. I drove the engine into Dupont, where we secured an engineer and fireman and went on to Chattahoochee. It was a terrible time, but I went on to the bridge at Way Cross with as fine a head of hair as ever a man wore, but when I came off I was as bald as the top of a gopher.

Canadian Indians Quiet. Special to the Globe. WINNEPEG, Man., Oct. 13.—The eighth annual session of the Northwest Council opened at Regina with the usual ceremonies. Gov. Dewdney, in his speech from the throne briefly referred to the great strides of the cattle industry during the last year, while the province, and to the completion of the Canadian Pacific railway. Speaking of Indian affairs, the governor said: "A feature of the year is the development of Indian affairs, and to assure your condition there was a time when the Indians were more contented, better clothed and better housed towards their white brethren than at present. The feeling of insecurity which, in consequence of the late appointment of a new agent when we last met has entirely subsided. The few rumors which have been circulated are, indicating the existence of a feeling of security among the Indians, arise mainly from the fact that lawless actions committed by Indians across the border have not been attributed to Indians in our territories. Measures have been taken to prevent such a continuation of identity recurring."

Interesting Details Regarding the Obsidian Cliff in Yellowstone Park. WASHINGTON, Oct. 13.—Among the scientific papers which will appear in the appendix to the report of the geologist in charge of the geological survey is one by Prof. Joseph P. Iddings upon an obsidian cliff in Yellowstone park. This cliff is an elevation half a mile long and 200 feet high, the material of which Prof. Iddings says: "Is as good a glass as any artificially manufactured." Its color is a smoky black, and it is highly translucent. My understanding is that the obsidian was obtained which poured down an ancient slope from the plateau lying east. It is impossible to determine the exact date of the eruption which may have been. The dense glass which now forms the lower portion is from seventy-five feet to a foot thick, while the porous and pumiceous upper portion has suffered from ages of erosion and glacial action. A remarkable feature of the cliff is the development of prismatic columns, which form its southern extremity. These are of shining black obsidian, rising from the base of the cliff to a height of six feet, with diameters varying from two to four feet. The color of the material of the columns is a smoky black, and they are highly translucent. The lustre of the rock and the brown streaks of color with the black are very striking. The places in which the process of cooling has been broken in small, angular pieces, which have been again collected by the later flow. In some places the material shows a fine, granular texture, while in other places a deep green is noticed, which, under the lens, resolves itself into thin beams of red and yellow. Through the black and red glass are scattered dull bluish-gray patches and bands, and round gray and pink masses, the former of which are believed to be the appearance and beauty of the rock and make it the most conspicuous and characteristic variety of volcanic lava known.

Texas Sittings. Judge DeLoach.—It is useless for you to say that you are innocent. You were caught in the act of pulling a silk handkerchief out of the pocket of the gentleman in front of you. I intended to return it to you as soon as the play was over. Prisoner.—Was the piece a comedy? Judge.—It was, your honor. Judge.—An American comedy? Prisoner.—It was, your honor. Judge.—No wonder you needed a handkerchief. You are discharged.

A Good Reason. National Weekly. "I wish I had lived in Rome in the olden times," said Shrinkin to his firm-handled spouse. "Do you think you would have been any more of a man?" "Perhaps not; but you couldn't have tried to wear my breeches." "You don't say so. I'd be ashamed to acknowledge it, if I was a man whose wife was obliged to wear them to keep up the dignity of the family, so there would be a man around the house somewhere." "Well, you wouldn't if I had lived in Rome." "I just would have if I was your wife, you idiot," screamed the now irate little woman. "You dress not; people didn't wear trousers in those days. They wore togas." "The girls in some parts of Africa have to be six feet high before they can marry. The Africans probably think that a small woman cannot manage a husband. A woman like you, in this country, would soon teach her better."
