MR. BOSTWICK'S LUCK.

It is Not as Bad as It Might Be. After All. The Story of a Steady Toiler and Humble Clerk. Poor Caleb was in despair. The most persistent and relentless sort of ill-luck had pursued this meek and exemplary little man for so long that he had grown quite accustomed to having things more or less awry with him...

It was a terribly severe blow to Caleb. He had grown from boyhood into a man now neither young nor old, and he was interrupted in the enjoyment of this one bit of unvarying good fortune, the little pay envelope every Saturday night with his week's wages to take home to his little wife and his four chubby little boys...

"IS IT A TRADE?" stammered poor Caleb, anxious to explain. "I don't want." "Fifteen hundred then, say fifteen hundred and I'll give you a check right here." "Really?" gasped Caleb. "I'll tell you what I'll do," persisted the stranger...

And now the snow was beginning to make its approach. It was a cold, crisp, biting wind that was blowing from the north. The snow was falling fast and thick, and the air was so cold that it was almost unbearable...

about to his feet and pressed on. About noon, reeling about, almost crazy, he came to the section house, and drank freely of the abundant water. [U] how he had had but little trouble in buying food at the section houses. But here they at first refused to sell. He had $2. He finally gave one of these for what he could eat, and it was considerable.

The next two days he lived in comparative luxury on his remaining dollar, staying at a good meal each day. The third day, however, being too independent to beg, and having no money with which to buy, he ate nothing. After his day's fast, his scruples were somewhat deadened, and on asking for aid he was given the only thing at hand—a can of tomatoes.

On his long trip his clothes had become soiled and ragged, and his appearance was such that no one would have employed him, even had his condition permitted of hard work. At last he was forced to leave the city to find food, and started on the coast. After long wandering and many hardships, he landed in Los Angeles. His health was nearly wasted, and too proud to send these being forced from the cars at Texas Hill, was Sunday, and coming to a dairy ranch he applied to the only person on the place—a workman—for something to eat. The house was locked, and the only thing to be had was a pan of milk, which was greedily drunk.

Derived Great Benefit. "So you are from Montana?" said a ministerial-looking man who was sharing his seat on an Eastern railroad with a Western man. "Yes, sir." "Are there any churches where you live?" "Yes, there are these 'ere things with a long sharp p'int stickin' up'n the air like an oil-can."
