REMOVE THE PEEL.

To the Editor of the Globe. I have visited, there is a very strict ordinance against casting orange peel, banana peel and the like on the sidewalks. This is surely as it should be, and ought to be very rigidly enforced, subjecting the offender to arrest and fine, or imprisonment. Many in our prisoners do far less harm. Let any one take notice of our sidewalks. When the sidewalks are frozen the penalty should be double. Yours respectfully, L. W. SWANLUND.

GRANTED A PARDON.

A Policeman's Slayer to Be Liberated. There will be released from the state prison to-day a convict named Antony Cantieni, who was convicted March 28, 1885, of manslaughter for killing a policeman at Minneapolis. His sentence was seven years' imprisonment, but upon investigation Gov. McGill deemed that the ends of justice had been done and yesterday signed a free pardon. There were many extenuating circumstances surrounding the crime favorable to the convict. He was a young man and had been on a spree, and the murder resulted from an altercation with the policeman. Terrible as the result was to the officer, Cantieni's imprisonment broke the heart of his aged mother and sent his sister a raving maniac to the state asylum. Largely upon these grounds, and the good conduct of the convict during incarceration, a free pardon was recommended by many influential Minneapolisians. They included Robert Knudson, prosecuting counsel; J. J. West, chief of police when the crime was committed; Michael Hoy, police inspector; Jacob Hein, superintendent of police, and the entire jury.
