OUR PLAN WOMEN.

Mrs. Stanley and Her Mother on Their American Sisters.

Many More Pretty Girls in London Than in New York.

The College Type the Best—Inartistic Use of the Decollete.

A Glimpse at the Life of the Great Explorer and His Lovely Wife.

Mrs. Stanley says that her "impressions" of America are distinctly educational, says the New York World. She thought of the natural grandeur of the country from "Picturesque America," and also from magazines. But when she saw the stretch of country she approached she asks, "Does this belong to the government?" and when told that it is private property and the people are sovereign her remark is "How very extraordinary!"

Of society she has little to say. "I do not find any difference in culture. Nobility of character and refinement of taste belong to the world. A true gentleman is the same in England, France, Russia and America, and a gentleman is a gentleman whether she is on this or the other side of the ocean."

She and her mother had been to a number of entertainments, and, according to her standards, they were of the 400 set. They thought the Gilders superior to the Astors. Both ladies were charming in their hospitality, but there was a distinct difference between their followers.

Mrs. Stanley said: "I did not think anything of the men at Mrs. Astor's ball. They did not compare with the men in the literary circles and were not equal in polish or intellect of the ladies."

She said that she was overpowered by the beauty of the New York women. At the ball there were strikingly handsome belles, and the average personal beauty was lower than you would find in a London drawing room.

what I was told in London I thought that all an American girl had to do was to crook her little finger and suitors would swarm at her feet. I know now that I deluded myself. Here, as in England, there are thousands and thousands of sweet, lovely, worthy girls who are fading away because there are no suitors for them. This is really deplorable, and a question of more importance, in my mind, than the labor problem. Something is radically wrong. The large families, too, have foreign, not American, mothers at their heads.

"That is what I was saying to Miss Grace Dodge," said Mrs. Stanley. "Now, in London, the Hon. Miss Maud Stanley is president of an immense working girls' society, and for year she has been studying the best methods of getting the sexes together. Every year the society has, among other entertainments, a couple of balls. Each girl can send word to Miss Maud Stanley, and she will see that the best methods of getting the sexes together. Every year the society has, among other entertainments, a couple of balls. Each girl can send word to Miss Maud Stanley, and she will see that the best methods of getting the sexes together."

At supper Mr. Stanley read Olive Schreiner's "Dreams," and read them beautifully. Then he revealed himself on tea, toast and baked apples, and defended the shy little woman from the carping Dodge. "I do not care what the features are, and you can't make me believe that the little African farmer is unlovely."

He asked if he would allow his wife to accompany him to Africa, he laid down the "Dreams" and said completely. "I never care for her again, and I will be over my body. No woman could go into Central Africa and come back with the character of her own womanhood. She would have to see things that would forever ruin her femininity, and, knowing of the experiences she had passed through, I never could bring her again, and I would be over my body."

It has been said that the great secret of love-making is not to overdo the compliment. Mrs. Stanley thoroughly understands. It would be impossible for a man to tire of her, for the simple reason that there is in her tenderness that is not of a truce, but the least inclination to wound the victim merely for the sake of such cherishing. She is as gay as a bird, and she has that which is as simple as a child. She has all that makes a woman charming—beauty, wit, brains, tenderness and sincerity.
