THE OLD OAKEN TREE. [Written for the Globe.] Oh, the old oaken tree, The old oaken tree, 'neath its broad-spreading branches I'd like now to be. When the hot sun bakes the hard city street, Casting a shadow of the temple and the bower of gold, And the diamonds that flash from the jewels of the crown, Deceptively glitter on the carpet, In the deep emerald carpet, richly dappled, when the sun is low, And the shade of the leaves artistically comes, The cool, rippling brook, as it swiftly glides by, Conspicuously sparkles a kiss to the sky; And the free, soulful laughter no hollowness knows. For character there, is not tailor-made clothes; Where the drowsy and placid-eyed herds in the vale Are lowing a bass to the sweet nightingale. On the slope of your hill, both the glowing sunset Trace radiance in a bright coronet. You may choose other pleasure, but nothing suits me Like an hour in the shade of the old oaken tree. —FRANK MAGRAW.
