THE SHERIFF WEAKENED.

At Bowers' shanty they didn't read Dante, or meditate on Kant, And intellectual pursuits you might admit were scant.

But down to Bower's the evening hours were spent in pastimes light,
Each night the men begun with cards and ended in a fight.

And in a broil like this one night did Bow-ers' four-year Tad, A blue-eyed boy with flaxen curls, a sturdy, reguish lad roguish lad—
His father's pistol take, in play, and swing it round his head— The charge by accident went off, and Hank Maione dropped dead.

"That imp, Thad Bowers," cried Hank's old pard, "has murdered Hank Malone,
I see him shoot, the little brute! The crime he can't disown.
Now take him out, an' string him up, and lift him high an' dry.
In cold blood has he killed my pard, the little wretch mus' die." "Yes, take him out an' string him up!" yelled those half-drunken men.
"We'll send the imp at double quick where he won't shoot again.
Sam Flint, we've made you sheriff here: Now show what you can do, We've got a hanging on our hands, we give the job to you."

'Come boy,'' said Sam, 'the time has come that I must stop your fun.

And now, my young kid, now I guess, that all your pranks are done.''

When Frastus Webber was in the wilds of Central Africa and he saw a venomous serpent leaping toward him he would whisk out a pair of dentist's forceps, which he always carried with him, seize the serpent by the head and extract his poison fangs before the snake had any idea of what he was doing. He did this repeatedly, and I can youch for it as true, because he told me himself.

He managed tigers very easily. He had a large number of little mirrors attached to a spiral spring. Whenever a tiger leaped upon him, which a tiger was very apt to do every few days, he would adroitly slip this spring over the tiger's nose. This would bring the mirror directly in front of the the tiger's eyes, and he would see his own image re-flected in the mirror, and taking it for another mad tiger, would chase after it on the gallop. The tiger would keep up this chase until he fell down and died from exhaustion. In the meantime Erastus Webber would sit down in per fect ease and fan himself under a This story was also told to me tree. This story was also told to me by Erastus himself, and so can be rethe great snake dangled equally distant from the ground. Then quicker than a flash of lightning, he tied the tail part of the snake around the body of the cougar, and the head part of the snake about the alligator, and so left them all three dangling in the air. The cougar just balanced the alligator, the alligator just balanced the cougar, and so the snake could neithe go up nor down, but hung there with those equal weights dangling from each end of itself, unable to move one way or the other. Erastus now quietly laid himself down and took a long and re-freshing sleep. When he awoke they we were all proud to be known as the acquaintances of such a man.

When he told, for instance, how he was once ten days and ten nights without even a plank to support himself, affoat in the Indian ocean; and how he escaped at last by killing a whale with his jack-knife, making a balloon of his skin and inflating it with hot air by burning the whale's oil; and then climbing into the balloon and floating off to Australia - when he told such stories as this, we were all proud to be known as the acquaintances of such an experienced and entertaining man So we always liked to take Erastus around, because as acquaintances of his we ourselves shone, in a lesser degree, through his reflected glory.

But we found it was dangerous to let him go off alone much, as he was always sure to come home very badly mangled and dislocated. It was no unusual thing for him to come home with his arms in the wrong place and his feet mismated. Unless he was watched he was always falling off the sidewalk and stumbling into gas trenches. He was so absorbed in the contemplation of his Australian and South American adventures that he was pretty sure to walk into every coal hole and come home covered from top to toe with nome covered from blood and coal dust. One time, while relating how, when ne was traveling in the Libvan desert. he was taken up by a hurricane and carried thirty-seven miles in the air, and only saved himself by making a paraclute of his cane and his palm leaf fan—while he was telling this tale he walked into an elevator well, and fortunately only broke one leg
