CHICAGO, March 9.—The market news today was almost exclusively and somewhat enthusiastically bullish, and May wheat closed with 3/8c gain. Corn gained 1/8c and oats 3/8c, but provisions finished slightly lower.

The primary market receipts were 294,000 bu against 291,000 bu. The Liverpool market was quiet, with upward tendency. A dispatch was received stating that Newport News had shipped 40,000 bbls of flour and 50,000 bu of wheat for twenty-four hours, and that freight engagements had been made for the shipment of 600,000 bu of wheat during the remainder of the month of March.

HE WAS CALLED "Old Higgins" when I first went on the paper, and no one ever knew him by any other name.

He was called "Old Higgins" when I first went on the paper, and no one ever knew him by any other name. He had landed on the other side of sixty-five and was bent and old when I first saw him one afternoon in June.

After that I frequently watched the old man as he lay in wait for the impudent bugs, and if his shears happened to land on the back of an audacious roach, it tickled Old Higgins so much that he nearly laughed outright.

The bugs learned to know him. They would come up over the back of his old desk, gaze at him an instant in aggravating attitude; then as he showed signs of fight they would turn and run as fast as their little legs would carry them.

As soon as a sufficient number of the enemy paused beneath the trap Old Higgins would suddenly dislodge the pencil and the falling book crushed dozens of lives out of existence. The hurried retreat of the survivors would cause Old Higgins no end of amusement, and more than once the old man went home tired out merely from battling with the bugs.

He carried on the unique warfare continually, and frequently a dozen or more of the pestiferous creatures were secretly through cracks in the partition. As the year passed on, Old Higgins and I became well acquainted.

He had aged perceptibly in that time, and it seemed a question of but a few months when "70" would be in. He had learned to rely on me and I covered all the runs, Higgins contenting himself with writing fake interviews with "a prominent citizen" and "a well-known Republican" and "a city editor."

In that year I became greatly attached to the old man, and noticed with sorrow that he was becoming childish and flighty. His copy often contained changes which, once published, would stamp the paper in a sea of litigation. Secretly, in the composing room, the night editor and I went over his copy, making such alterations as we saw fit. Old Higgins never knew it, for he never read the paper.

I approached his door with sinking heart, and it seemed a question of but a few moments when "70" would be in. He had learned to rely on me and I covered all the runs, Higgins contenting himself with writing fake interviews with "a prominent citizen" and "a well-known Republican" and "a city editor."

He was called "Old Higgins" when I first went on the paper, and no one ever knew him by any other name. He had landed on the other side of sixty-five and was bent and old when I first saw him one afternoon in June.

ECZEMA From early childhood... CHILDHOOD... NEW FACES ALL ABOUT CHANGING...

OLD HIGGINS BY CORK His left hand clutched the shears. As I reached the door, his left hand shot forward, there was a sharp sound as the shears struck the table and Higgins wheeled round and told me that another reckless insect had gone to its death.
