CURE BUT NOT A GOLD CURE.

Facts Learned by a Visit to the Borton Institute Where the Drink Disease is Treated.

While waiting for a car a reporter for the Globe overheard two prominent physicians discussing the relative merits of vegetable and mineral remedies.

"I am thankful to say it is not," the reporter said. "Don't you cure jags here?" asked the doctor.

"Most assuredly; but we use only vegetable remedies."

"What effect does your treatment have upon persons taking it? Does it effect the brain?"

"Our treatment is beneficial in every sense. We guarantee a cure or will refund all money paid. We grade the treatment to meet the requirements of the disease, making it neither too strong nor too mild, and consequently we avoid all straining of the brain or system. Patients are not deprived of drink. It is furnished them until they give it up of their own free will.

"Has your treatment any bad effects?" was asked. "Absolutely none. We positively guarantee not to destroy or lessen any bodily function."

Upon expressing satisfaction with the treatment, and inquiring for terms, Mr. Weigel stated he would guarantee a cure for $100, and if not cured for $200. This amount includes board, room and baths, irrespective of length of time required, though generally three weeks is sufficient to effect a cure.

"I will guarantee a cure for that amount, but I will not take your friend. Our reputation is too good to us, our treatment is too good to think of such a thing. Besides we do not want any one's money without giving full value in return. As to the time, your friend will lose much more if he continues to drink or if he takes any other course."

Upon invitation, the reporter inspected several of the patients' rooms, and while they were not elaborately furnished, everything was substantial, neat and clean and had the appearance of comfort and not style was sought. These conditions prevailed throughout the institution. The newspaper man expressed a desire to see some of the patients, but was informed this would be impossible, unless they gave consent, as all business was with all correspondence is strictly confidential.
