GENUINE COERCION. We have heard so much about coercion during the progress of this campaign that it is interesting when genuine instances of it come under notice.

Ex-President Harrison once remarked, with one of those cold sneers that congeal so readily on his lips, that the "Democrats are students of maxims, not markets." Mr. McKinley's idea that we are still in the depression caused by the plunge of 1893 indicates certainly that he is not a student of markets, while his remedy as clearly shows that he is not a student of maxims.

Let the figures of our foreign trade in manufactures tell the story, remembering that in the years covered by the following table, the increase in the quantity of manufactures exported is not indicated by their values, because in all those years the cost and price have been falling.

No matter in which direction this weapon may cut, it is an outrage and a disgrace that it should be employed in any American community. The carrying of political animosity into business life and commercial relations is one symptom of the growth in this country of a tendency to repress and destroy individual liberty, which has never shown out so strongly as in the Bryan campaign.

Consider the situation. A man whose business is buying and selling for a modest profit, whose customers are his neighbors, who has dealt with them for perhaps a lifetime, and is respected by them for honesty and fair dealing, dare not say where his political preferences lie lest it should ruin his trade.

These foreign nations are doing some $90,000,000 less work for us than they were during the period he laments and whose conditions he wants restored. When, in addition to this, it is considered that over half of these imports are either articles of food and live animals, or articles in a crude condition for domestic industry, the utter baselessness of Mr. McKinley's statement becomes glaringly apparent.

UNDER FREE COINAGE. To the Editor of the Globe. If free coinage becomes a law, will the government take the bullion and issue silver certificates that will be legal tender?

BETTER STUDY MARKETS. On Tuesday Mr. McKinley addressed another batch of visitors from his doorstep, in which he commented on the statement of Secretary Herbert that he had found England and Europe unusually prosperous while this country remained depressed.

STILL FEEDING THE WOULD. The golden tide of outflowing grain started the return tide of inflowing gold, and the reports of our foreign trade show how the one has responded to the other, and how much more than last year our granaries and cattle yards are feeding the hungry of the old world.

AT THE THEATERS. A matinee today at 2:30 and a performance tonight at 8:15 will conclude the engagement at the Grand Edifice. "In Old Kentucky" opens tomorrow night.

WILL LIVE TILL TUESDAY. Two chickens were granted a continuance in the Police Court. Two chickens were granted a continuance in the Police Court.
