AN ELECTION SURPRISE. An Ex-Slave becomes a Member of the Governor's Council in Massachusetts.

of the successful candidate, and he is to be one of the eight men who are to compose the governor's council, an august body, which lends something to the dignity which surrounds the office of chief executive of the commonwealth in the Old Bay State, but which is unknown in most of the other states of the Union.

plantation at Hampton, Va., about fifty-four years ago. During the war he ran away from his master and found protection inside the Union lines. Gen. Butler picked him up, and afterward made him steward on his famous yacht America. Later on Allen opened a restaurant in the west end of the city. He was successful in business and is said to be in comfortable circumstances. For a number of years Allen has been an active figure in local politics. He has been a ward leader of no little influence, and was an enthusiastic campaigner for Gen. Butler in his historic canvass for the governorship. As a member of the governor's council, Mr. Allen will be called upon to take no very active part in running the state government, the position being largely an honorary one, but he will be expected to be present at various impressive and solemn functions of state, and to attend the governor when receptions of a semi-official nature are given at the state house. The governor's council can suggest a policy in dealing with certain lines of legislation and all appointments made by the governor must first be approved by his council before they can be confirmed. Mr. Allen will frequently be called upon to appear in a clauhammer coat, but his duties will be light. His salary will be $750 a year, with all expenses paid, which will allow him to hire an extra cashier in his restaurant and devote considerable of his time to the interests of the commonwealth.

Females in Demand. A feature of the population statistics of Western Australia is the large proportion of females to males. The disparity is maintained in the arrivals by sea. A present there are forty-five females to every 100 males in Western Australia. Not a Bostonian Definition. New York Times: Ella—I was trying to draw him out. Stella—Do you mean pull his leg?
