WOMEN ALONE. Women can travel alone in the New England states without the slightest apprehension of anything disagreeable. She is severely left alone except when assistance is necessary. Then she will receive it promptly. No preparations are made—no pretenses that it is a pleasure to do this or that. It needed to be done and is done, and thanks are usually replied to simply with a nod. The New Englander is neither warm nor gallant, but he is civil. He recognizes an unknown woman's right to ask a question of a man and receive a civil answer. Often a man will walk some distance to show the road or point out the street that is being looked for.

Even at the railway stations persons in uniform give the requisite information as to a train's time of starting and whatever the questioner wants to know promptly and without seeming, and in a car a man seems to offer a woman a seat as a matter of course and instantly turns his back on her. If an unknown woman thanks a civil New England stranger with a smile for any courtesy, he fixes her in a way peculiar to himself. Truth to tell, he is seldom obliged to do this by New England women, but a native of elsewhere sometimes beams upon him as a token of gratitude and ever after wonders what a dreadful thing that man thought of her. Down South a woman traveling alone is simply taken care of by every man she meets. A feeling prevails that a solitary female is in great danger, and men behave to her as women would to an unprotected baby. They look kindly at her, they address her gently, they make her feel as though the days of chivalry had returned. The manner of a Southern gentleman to a woman traveling alone is simply perfection, and she may safely show that she appreciates the fact. I have never traveled in the West, but I believe there is a manly care of a lonely woman's welfare shown in most places, but I know my New York well. Heaven help the solitary female stranger who—for a time abides there! Natives can manage well enough. They learn that all a woman can do in Gotham is to demand decent treatment and fight her way, but never was there a place in our country where she receives so little consideration, is so rudely treated by some masculine fellow travelers or with such offensive gallantry by others; where officials whose duty it is to reply to questions often either refuse to do so or answer as they would a troublesome idiot; where women may fall about in the middle of a car, where youthful masculines stretch their long limbs at ease and be allowed out of her place by men in the case of a postoffice, station or a savings bank or a theater. Rudeness is the rule in New York; but, for the credit of our countrymen, let me declare that those who are offensive to women are invariably foreigners. The rough manner, the coarse suspicion, the offensive gallantry, have all been brought across the ocean to air themselves in the land of liberty, and also in any crowd of the great city, there will be twenty foreigners to one American. —Mary Kyle Dallas.
