NEWSPAPERS IN RUSSIA. Journals of Age and Influence in the East's Dominions. Newspapers printed in the Russian language are not circulated nor read generally in the United States, and any one who has ever made even a cursory examination of a Russian newspaper printed in Russian characters can see at a glance why, so far as this country is concerned, they do not "fill a long felt want." In the naming of Russian newspapers such journalistic titles as Sun, Gazette, Press, Observer, Star, Courier, Bulletin, Advertiser and Eagle do not prevail, but in place of these more descriptive titles are used; the New York Sun is the Daily Novoye Vremya, or the New Times, of St. Petersburg. One of the illustrated St. Petersburg weeklies is called The Neva, after the river which flows through that capital, and the two weekly newspapers longest established in the city of Moscow are the Boudnik and The Krougouzor; otherwise The Alarm and The Horizon. For some reason which is not very clear, the word "viedomosti" meaning "news" is popular as a newspaper designation in the city of Moscow. There are four daily newspapers in Moscow having this title—the Russian News, Modern News, Moscow News and Old News. The Old News is maintained for the republication of articles from other newspapers. There are, perhaps, some newspapers in the United States worthy of being called the Old News, but it is certain that there is no newspaper in the United States which formally and volitionally would assume that title. The official newspaper of Warsaw is The Warsaw Police Gazette, and the word "gazette" (gazeta) is as popular with Warsaw editors as the word "news" is in Moscow. There are the Warsaw Police Gazette, the Warsaw Gazette, the Warsaw German Gazette and the Warsaw Gazette Courier. The Gazette Courier makes a specialty of telegraphic information, and is not, therefore, properly speaking, a gazette courier, whose title comes from the days of mail coaches and newspaper deliveries by messengers on horseback.
