

ROMANCE AMONG THE OIL WELLS.

How Fortunes Have Been Made and Lost in Transactions in Petroleum.

It is now about two years since the phenomenal advance in oil, occasioned by the war known to the stock market of the stocks in the winter of 1894-5. During that two years one of the most exciting chapters of oil region history has been written, and the epoch passes away to find conditions but little changed in any respect.

The market is a few cents lower, with a hope of an upward tendency, just as existed at the opening of March, 1895. The stocks have increased considerably, yet not enough to create any excitement. The number of new wells has been unprecedented in the two years, more having been drilled since the opening of 1895 than in the best three years previously, and nearly as many as in the five years just preceding, says the Pittsburgh Dispatch.

Two years ago oil men became imbued with the fear that the oil territory was reaching its limit. The notion spread as the stocks fell rapidly, and in March such a panic took possession of the market as even the oldest operators had never seen, and which, as subsequent experience has shown, was wholly groundless. In a few days after the price of crude started upward it ran away, and from the edge of the dollar mark it bounded upward until the price reached $2.60, a figure never dreamed of by anybody. It could not long hold that unnatural lodgment and almost as quickly as it went up the high figures were shaken off. But the market held above a dollar until just before the holidays, or nearly two years.

The experience of the two phenomenal years in the oil field has developed two things beyond doubt. The American oil regions are not in danger of exhaustion. The best fields are still fields likely to depend right away again on the big and enduring pools that began with Pithole and reached the climax in the great black sand dunes at Bradford. Since the excitement began in 1895 the drill has been uncommonly busy. The number of new wells each year has exceeded 7,000, the total for the two years being almost 15,000. In new territory the scout and wildcatter have prosecuted their work, and in fields already run over the drill has been made to do duty. Strongly enough, it is not in new country that the prizes have been met that reward the efforts of the operator. The best pools have been in country thought to have been thoroughly explored, and in its day abandoned. Among the best producers were the Chipmunk and the Watsonville pools, in the Bradford field, and every foot of the ground has been as familiar to the driller for years as the best leases in the neighborhood. The Hingham lot was the beginning of the Bradford renaissance. Then Watsonville followed, and a region that had been drilled and drilled until the notion that oil would be found in the Bradford field was a theme for a joke. Chipmunk was pretty nearly as decisively condemned. Yet the two of them have been producing oil enough to stay the decline in stocks and to add materially to the quantity on hand. In Washington county the Cecil pool was one of the most evanescent ever known. In a few days the production had climbed up to hundreds of barrels, and in a few days more the wells were pumping a dry lead. The jugular vein was small, but it afforded a rich return for those wells that tapped it while it held its treasure.

The Frieden and Diet pools in the Sistersville country gave promise, and reached a production daily of 6,000 barrels. This territory was short-lived, as was the Hebron and the Belmont development that followed. In Pennsylvania, through Butler, Allegheny, Greene and other counties, little pools of apparent magnitude have come to light, only to flash in a short time, and show that but a few thousand barrels of oil were to result. The two years of unceasing search for oil have resulted in the discovery of nothing that gives promise for the future, so far as the opening of new territory is concerned, and nothing that leads to the expectation of big quantities of oil from any section. Tennessee, which one time offered considerable hope, has not held up anticipations. The Kentucky counties near the Tennessee line are about as dead. The formation so definitely that it affords no light on what to expect, and the discoveries are too often empty pockets in the cavernous limestone to pin any faith to that section of the Union as a source of supply for the future.

The Great Mouse Hunt. A lady, while engaged in the pursuit of her domestic duties, encountered a mouse in the regard the region as no good. The 15,000 wells drilled in the hope of finding rich rewards within the past two years have brought to the operator the conviction that in the states where the fields that are already familiar to him he must do his prospecting, and that in the territories looked upon as exhausted he will find enough oil to keep the market supplied if he hunts for it diligently.

As the situation stands at the present the pools are seen to be of small caliber, and the oil production stands where it did two years ago, except that so much more exploration has been carried on without finding big strikes. Yet that discourages nobody, and neither does it affect the market for crude. The success of the men who have gone over the old fields of the upper counties is evidence enough that it is as useful to go back and drill the untested lands as to seek vainly in untrodden fields. It is proved beyond doubt by the experience of the two years that were spent in going over much ground apparently the second time, that one well does not condemn anything around it, except for a very short distance. A dry hole may be punched under a derrick the shadow of which falls on the borders of a rich pool, but it ever so small.

AN ENORMOUS OUTPUT. The biggest oil production the country has known was in 1891, when the output of illuminating oil was 33,750,000 barrels. Last year it exceeded 33,500,000. Were it not that the market for illuminating oil has not been any too much for a growing trade, but that better methods of producing it are being discovered, it is becoming such an important factor in illuminating that its oil uses as a fuel oil have been made impossible by the advancing cost.

Among the 15,000 wells drilled in the last two years were 3,500 dry holes, representing probably an outlay of $5,000,000, more, absolutely valueless. Could all the wells drilled in the two years be put one behind another in a continuous string, and a cable with sand pump hanging in the hole thus formed, it would reach up from the bottom of the hole would require about the same time that it takes for a passenger train to go from San Francisco and cross the continent and then embark and sail across the sea to London, provided the said pump travels at the speed of fast trains and fast steamers. The cost of the oil and the lowering of the pump and bringing up one barrel full of sand and water. The experience of the last two years shows that the only new and reliable field to turn to is West Virginia. That state has a reputation for producing oil, and though the cost of a well in the deep and treacherous rock is great, the rewards that come from the wells are so great that the wildcatter will keep on. No doubt an enormous quantity of oil will be taken yet from the great fields of the West Virginia hills have been explored over so generally that the best to be hoped for in this territory is the discovery of a pool, and the further coaxing of the older wells.

"OWNEY" STILL LIVES. Postal Dog Was Not Murdered at Cleveland.

"Owney" is still alive. The bearer of this unique name hardly needs an introduction, says the Chicago Inter-Ocean. The dog was a prominent figure before the public, and when the report was sent from Cleveland about two weeks ago that he had been shot by a newly appointed policeman, it caused the fame and friends, there was widespread sorrow throughout Uncle Sam's mail service. An attempt was made to recover the body of the railway mail service, is perhaps the only person who has fully failed to appreciate "Owney's" worth. A man who had told him that the dog should not be carried on the cars any more, as he had become a nuisance. This was pointed out by the biographers and obtundants of "the greatest dog that ever lived," as the beginning of "Owney's" decadence until he fell afool of the blunderbuss of the peanut-puffing bluecoat.

but it luckily transpired that the stain-slinging was premature. Capt. White, superintendent of the mail service at Washington, has heard of the interesting case of "Owney," sent inquiries to Cleveland, asking if the body of the great traveler could be secured in order that his skin could be mounted and preserved in the Washington Museum. This brought about an investigation, and it was discovered that the dog had been killed at Cleveland, and that the kind-hearted Samaritan at St. Louis stated that the dog was recovering from an attack of sickness, and he wanted to know if he could be carried on the cars again. Superintendent Troy replied to Melven that his order to keep him off the mail cars was still in force and advised him to give "Owney" a quiet home for the rest of his natural life. "Owney's" habits are so marked that he will evidently find his way back to the mail cars. The news of his resurrection occasioned great joy among the mail clerks at the postoffice yesterday.

Not Allowed to Forget It. "Yesterday," said Jabson, "I refused a poor woman a request for a small sum of money, and in consequence of my act I passed a sleepless night. The tones of her voice, were ringing in my ears the whole time." "Your softness of heart does you credit," said Mabson; "who was the woman?" "My wife," Detroit Free Press.

four barrel. Now, most ladies, under similar circumstances, would have uttered a few gentle rebukes, and then sought safety in the street; but this one possessed more than the ordinary degree of genuine courage. She summoned the man servant, and told him to get the gun, call the dog, and station himself in the convenient distance. Then she clambered half-way upstairs, and commenced to punch the four barrel with a pole. Presently the mouse made its appearance, and started across the floor. The dog at once went in pursuit. The man fired, and the dog dropped dead; the lady fainted, and fell down the stairs; and the man, thinking that she was killed, and fearing that he would be arrested for murder, disappeared, and has never been seen since. The mouse escaped—Tit-Bits.

HOW IT WAS PAID. He Certainly Won, but the Stakes Went to the Wrong Person.

"Why do you seem to try to avoid Miss Sweet?" asked the man with the cigar. "Only a week ago you were devoted to her," says the Chicago Post. The man with the cigarette scowled. "Don't speak of her," he said. "She is the most aggravating, underhand and designing girl that ever walked the earth."

"What has she done?" "Oh, she hasn't done a thing but play a regular confidence game on me," returned the man with the cigarette. "You see, we made a bet."

"I bet a box of candy against a kiss on what was practically a certainty?" "Yes," said the man with the cigarette. "The inference being," said the man with the cigarette with emphasis, "that she would win a little rather lose the bet than win it. Naturally I was considerably elated, but to avoid any possible mistake I made her promise that she would surely pay if she lost and not try to get out of it on any technicality."

"And she agreed?" "Promised faithfully—in fact, seemed offended to think that I had deemed it necessary to exact such a promise; and she was a girl of her word and whatever she promised she would do. And then I won the bet."

"Well, she kept out of my way for a while, so that I had no chance to collect, but finally I caught her and asked her if she intended to pay the bet."

"Pay it," she cried. "Why, I've already paid it."

"I've never received that kiss," I asserted. "Then you've got no one but your sister to give to you," she answered. "I gave it to her to give to you."

The man with the cigar gave a low whistle. "That was a mean trick," he admitted. "The man with the cigarette," he continued, "will take work of any kind; best of city references. Address X. Y. Z., 113 Sixth st. south, Minneapolis."
