

DR. BURKHART Bursts Forth With Renewed Splendor and Power.

The Suffering Multitude Implores His Aid.

Thirty Million Scuples of Dr. Burkhardt's Vegetable Compound Distributed Among the Sick on Two Continents.

Disease Takes Flight and the Drug Stores Are Besieged Where the Eager Crowds Clamor for Dr. Burkhardt's Vegetable Compound.

STARTLING REVELATIONS IN THE HISTORY OF A FAMOUS MEDICINE.

The Central and Western States Are Visited by Dr. Burkhardt's Extensive Corps of Advertising Experts.

It is better to give than to receive was proclaimed nearly two thousand years ago by the great apostle of Nazareth, and through centuries...

The St. Paul Republican newspaper is inclined to have run with Bank Examiner Pope because he aims to systematize his office. The plan of throwing reports indiscriminately into the vault or else without having them reviewed...

POPE'S ENCYCLICAL.

BALTIMORE, Feb. 22.—Cardinal Gibbons said today that he had just received the letter in which the pope discusses "Americanism" and which has been partly published, and added: "I expect to receive it and have it ready for publication by Saturday next. Until then I have no comment to make upon the subject."

Cost of War and Education.

Table with columns for Country and Amount. Includes France, Prussia, England, Holland, Belgium, Austria, Switzerland, and United States.

BILIOUSNESS

"I have used your valuable CASCARILLA and find them perfect. Could not get without them. I have used them for some time for indigestion and biliousness and on no account cured. Recommend them to every one. Once tried, you will never be without them in the family." EDW. A. MANN, Albany, N. Y.

AMOUNT INVOLVED SMALL

But the Reason Why the State Didn't Draw Interest Might Be of Interest—A Republican Editor Worries About the Office—Senator Johnson Still Parading His Friends.

Bank Examiner Pope has submitted to Gov. Lind a special report asking for instructions as to the disposition of a fund of $1,700,000, which was turned over to him by his predecessor, Moses D. Kenyon.

The money is the balance of a fund created by the legislature twenty-five years ago for the redemption of bank notes issued by state banks and has been in the custody of the bank examiner for over ten years. There has been no demand on this fund since Mr. Kenyon first took office a decade ago.

The governor still continues to use the act, the last head to fall, being that of Elmer H. Derrin, the present very efficient insurance commissioner. While the right of the governor to make such appointments as please him is undisputed, it is not so in the case of the state funds, and this will doubtless be done, as there is no probability that any of the old state bank certificates are still outstanding, some provision will be made for the payment, if any are presented in the future.

The attorney general's office is overworked already without having to furnish any of Gov. Lind's appointed with information or advice, the following incident of a few days ago will suffice. A gentleman dropped into the office and remarked to the examiner: "Well, you seem to be hard at work."

"Yes," replied the gentleman, whose brains are pitted against the best legal talent of the state in every case that comes up. "Yes," replied the assistant, "I am trying to find out how many acres Derrin had in a quarter section of land."

The attorney general's office is overworked already without having to furnish any of Gov. Lind's appointed with information or advice, the following incident of a few days ago will suffice. A gentleman dropped into the office and remarked to the examiner: "Well, you seem to be hard at work."

Senator Johnson, of St. Peter, seems to be finding more or less delight in annoying the administration, although he has received more recognition than the governor's colleagues. His vote against the bill to amend the act of 1897, which could not be satisfactorily explained by his friends. But here is something which he has written to his paper, the St. Peter Herald, which is no comment to make upon the subject.

The Mankato Daily Review, in a recent editorial on the action of the legislature in passing the sugar bounty bill over Gov. Lind's veto, concludes as follows: "The bill is a gratuity to the sugar trust of the country that had every dollar's worth of its sugar placed before a Senate and not a cent of bounty was given to the man who was an experimenter than the man who built the machinery and built the factory."

What Society Is Doing.

Mr. and Mrs. Oscar Hallam gave the second of a series of such parties last evening at their residence, on Fairmount avenue. The parlors were prettily decorated with American Beauty and President Carnot roses. Cards were played at ten tables. Mrs. Ham was assisted by Miss Hall and the Misses Fairchild.

Mrs. William Smith entertained a company of fifty at progressive euchre yesterday evening at her home, 215 North Broadway. Mrs. Smith was assisted by the Misses Smith.

Mrs. F. I. Towle, of Laurel, avenue, entertained a number of ladies at duplicate whist Tuesday afternoon.

Mrs. Grant Wagner, of Holly avenue, gave children's party yesterday afternoon in honor of her little daughter, Ruth's birthday. Miss Harriet A. Egan, of Grand avenue, entertained Miss Margaret J. Evans, of Northfield, at luncheon Tuesday.

Mrs. Strauss, of Pleasant avenue, entertained the Stormy Euche club Tuesday afternoon. High scores were made by Mrs. Fry, Mrs. Walters, Mrs. Weiz and Mrs. Macklett.

Mrs. J. L. Messner entertained at luncheon yesterday at the Ashland for Mrs. Mitchell, of Louisville.

An all-day reception was held yesterday at the rooms of the Young Women's Friendly association, on Jackson street. The rooms were lavishly decorated with the patriotic colors and several large bouquets of flowers were sent through the kindness of L. L. May and S. W. Anderson.

The White Flyer cycling club gave its regular monthly hop last evening at Sherman hall. The hall was decorated with flags and the club colors. The orchestra played for the evening. Supper was served at 11 o'clock.

The St. Paul Camp No. 1, Sons of Veterans, held their anniversary last evening at the hall. The hall was decorated with the national colors and the banners of the order. A large portrait of General Grant rested on an easel at one end of the hall.

Washington's birthday exercises were held last night at the hall. The exercises were given by the Young Men's Christian association of Washington and his cabinet and gentlemen of the church. A supper was served at 10 o'clock.

The Ladies' Society of the Norwegian Lutheran church, corner of Main City hall last night. The hall was decorated with the national colors and the banners of the order. A large portrait of General Grant rested on an easel at one end of the hall.

Sibley Circle No. 8, Ladies of the G. A. R., gave its first anniversary reception Tuesday afternoon at the hall. The hall was decorated with the national colors and the banners of the order. A large portrait of General Grant rested on an easel at one end of the hall.

The West Side turnverein celebrated Washington's birthday with a social dancing party held at their rooms in the Marquis opera house block on the West side, last night. The hall was decorated with the national colors and the banners of the order. A large portrait of General Grant rested on an easel at one end of the hall.

Mrs. Osterlund, of Clark street, gave a coffee party yesterday afternoon. About twenty-five ladies were present.

Mrs. Mabel Stark, of Holly avenue, has returned from a visit to Duluth.

Continued from First Page.

out, but the conscience of the nation was aroused by the mismanagement of an ill-fated war. It was no longer possible to tolerate fourth-century methods of government without in sight of our own land, and we put it down. And again the volunteer returned to the field of duty. He promptly and efficiently. The European governments sneered and asked what could our raw troops do against the trained battalions of Europe. They effected the liberty of an island from the yoke of a government under which it has suffered, and they gained honor for their arms and the things of their country.

"Some of you may think that a large infusion of foreign blood is not desirable, but I will ask these old men whether you were sustained in the hour of battle and in the hour of your ancestors by the thoughts of father, mother, sweetheart and what they would say to you? It's the ideal within you, the pride of the moment that it is, the aspiration we are living for and want to hand down to our children that gives us courage to fight for the principles of our country."

The governor's speech was preceded by musical and other exercises. On the platform sat ex-Gov. Ramsey, Bishop Gilbert and many leaders of the patriotic societies, and in the galleries were 900 school children, who rendered the vocal selections. Judge Murray, of Milwaukee, presided, and prayer was offered by the Rev. Dudley Ward Rhodes, chaplain of the Sons of the Revolution, immediately after the reading of the Declaration of Independence.

The close of the eighteenth century beheld two great political revolutions. The people of France rose in revolt against the abuses of an outworn feudalism and after deluging the nation with blood and carnage, they set at the last in subjection to the rule of a military despot. The colonists of North America, who had rebelled against the British crown, found a fair republic that the people of the world will always prize.

The close of the eighteenth century beheld two great political revolutions. The people of France rose in revolt against the abuses of an outworn feudalism and after deluging the nation with blood and carnage, they set at the last in subjection to the rule of a military despot. The colonists of North America, who had rebelled against the British crown, found a fair republic that the people of the world will always prize.

The close of the eighteenth century beheld two great political revolutions. The people of France rose in revolt against the abuses of an outworn feudalism and after deluging the nation with blood and carnage, they set at the last in subjection to the rule of a military despot. The colonists of North America, who had rebelled against the British crown, found a fair republic that the people of the world will always prize.

The close of the eighteenth century beheld two great political revolutions. The people of France rose in revolt against the abuses of an outworn feudalism and after deluging the nation with blood and carnage, they set at the last in subjection to the rule of a military despot. The colonists of North America, who had rebelled against the British crown, found a fair republic that the people of the world will always prize.

The close of the eighteenth century beheld two great political revolutions. The people of France rose in revolt against the abuses of an outworn feudalism and after deluging the nation with blood and carnage, they set at the last in subjection to the rule of a military despot. The colonists of North America, who had rebelled against the British crown, found a fair republic that the people of the world will always prize.

The close of the eighteenth century beheld two great political revolutions. The people of France rose in revolt against the abuses of an outworn feudalism and after deluging the nation with blood and carnage, they set at the last in subjection to the rule of a military despot. The colonists of North America, who had rebelled against the British crown, found a fair republic that the people of the world will always prize.

The close of the eighteenth century beheld two great political revolutions. The people of France rose in revolt against the abuses of an outworn feudalism and after deluging the nation with blood and carnage, they set at the last in subjection to the rule of a military despot. The colonists of North America, who had rebelled against the British crown, found a fair republic that the people of the world will always prize.

The close of the eighteenth century beheld two great political revolutions. The people of France rose in revolt against the abuses of an outworn feudalism and after deluging the nation with blood and carnage, they set at the last in subjection to the rule of a military despot. The colonists of North America, who had rebelled against the British crown, found a fair republic that the people of the world will always prize.

The close of the eighteenth century beheld two great political revolutions. The people of France rose in revolt against the abuses of an outworn feudalism and after deluging the nation with blood and carnage, they set at the last in subjection to the rule of a military despot. The colonists of North America, who had rebelled against the British crown, found a fair republic that the people of the world will always prize.

The close of the eighteenth century beheld two great political revolutions. The people of France rose in revolt against the abuses of an outworn feudalism and after deluging the nation with blood and carnage, they set at the last in subjection to the rule of a military despot. The colonists of North America, who had rebelled against the British crown, found a fair republic that the people of the world will always prize.

The close of the eighteenth century beheld two great political revolutions. The people of France rose in revolt against the abuses of an outworn feudalism and after deluging the nation with blood and carnage, they set at the last in subjection to the rule of a military despot. The colonists of North America, who had rebelled against the British crown, found a fair republic that the people of the world will always prize.

The close of the eighteenth century beheld two great political revolutions. The people of France rose in revolt against the abuses of an outworn feudalism and after deluging the nation with blood and carnage, they set at the last in subjection to the rule of a military despot. The colonists of North America, who had rebelled against the British crown, found a fair republic that the people of the world will always prize.

His Greatest Services

to his country were rendered after the surrender of Cornwallis. The period which intervened between that surrender and the adoption of the constitution has well been styled the "critical period of American history." Independence had been won by the property, the arms and the blood of the returned, but the exhausted nation found itself confronted with a problem as difficult and as serious as that which it had won. It was plain that the confederation was no longer a popular government. Only a weight. Under the exigencies of war the people had tolerated that weak and inefficient government, but now that peace had returned, they were no longer content with a temporary makeshift. Without power to enforce its will, its mandates had been obeyed, but the several states, each in its own interest or patriotism might dictate its congress, and a fixed place of abode, had wandered from place to place, and the people were hardly a score of members, and on one occasion they met in all on the approach of a regiment of mutinous soldiers, clamoring for arrears of pay.

It is not natural that on this day, primarily devoted to the consideration of an early period in our history, some thoughts should be given to the present and the future. For my own part, I am unable to agree with that view frequently expressed which finds little to admire in the present and which contemplates the present chiefly to point a warning as to the future. Despite the fact that the times have changed, and that the conditions are different, the principles of our government are the same. We are not to fear comparison with the past. The contemporaneous history of a hundred or more years shows that the principles of our government have been affirmed and that the people have been able to maintain them. The principles of our government are the same. We are not to fear comparison with the past. The contemporaneous history of a hundred or more years shows that the principles of our government have been affirmed and that the people have been able to maintain them.

It is not natural that on this day, primarily devoted to the consideration of an early period in our history, some thoughts should be given to the present and the future. For my own part, I am unable to agree with that view frequently expressed which finds little to admire in the present and which contemplates the present chiefly to point a warning as to the future. Despite the fact that the times have changed, and that the conditions are different, the principles of our government are the same. We are not to fear comparison with the past. The contemporaneous history of a hundred or more years shows that the principles of our government have been affirmed and that the people have been able to maintain them.

It is not natural that on this day, primarily devoted to the consideration of an early period in our history, some thoughts should be given to the present and the future. For my own part, I am unable to agree with that view frequently expressed which finds little to admire in the present and which contemplates the present chiefly to point a warning as to the future. Despite the fact that the times have changed, and that the conditions are different, the principles of our government are the same. We are not to fear comparison with the past. The contemporaneous history of a hundred or more years shows that the principles of our government have been affirmed and that the people have been able to maintain them.

It is not natural that on this day, primarily devoted to the consideration of an early period in our history, some thoughts should be given to the present and the future. For my own part, I am unable to agree with that view frequently expressed which finds little to admire in the present and which contemplates the present chiefly to point a warning as to the future. Despite the fact that the times have changed, and that the conditions are different, the principles of our government are the same. We are not to fear comparison with the past. The contemporaneous history of a hundred or more years shows that the principles of our government have been affirmed and that the people have been able to maintain them.

It is not natural that on this day, primarily devoted to the consideration of an early period in our history, some thoughts should be given to the present and the future. For my own part, I am unable to agree with that view frequently expressed which finds little to admire in the present and which contemplates the present chiefly to point a warning as to the future. Despite the fact that the times have changed, and that the conditions are different, the principles of our government are the same. We are not to fear comparison with the past. The contemporaneous history of a hundred or more years shows that the principles of our government have been affirmed and that the people have been able to maintain them.

It is not natural that on this day, primarily devoted to the consideration of an early period in our history, some thoughts should be given to the present and the future. For my own part, I am unable to agree with that view frequently expressed which finds little to admire in the present and which contemplates the present chiefly to point a warning as to the future. Despite the fact that the times have changed, and that the conditions are different, the principles of our government are the same. We are not to fear comparison with the past. The contemporaneous history of a hundred or more years shows that the principles of our government have been affirmed and that the people have been able to maintain them.

It is not natural that on this day, primarily devoted to the consideration of an early period in our history, some thoughts should be given to the present and the future. For my own part, I am unable to agree with that view frequently expressed which finds little to admire in the present and which contemplates the present chiefly to point a warning as to the future. Despite the fact that the times have changed, and that the conditions are different, the principles of our government are the same. We are not to fear comparison with the past. The contemporaneous history of a hundred or more years shows that the principles of our government have been affirmed and that the people have been able to maintain them.

It is not natural that on this day, primarily devoted to the consideration of an early period in our history, some thoughts should be given to the present and the future. For my own part, I am unable to agree with that view frequently expressed which finds little to admire in the present and which contemplates the present chiefly to point a warning as to the future. Despite the fact that the times have changed, and that the conditions are different, the principles of our government are the same. We are not to fear comparison with the past. The contemporaneous history of a hundred or more years shows that the principles of our government have been affirmed and that the people have been able to maintain them.

It is not natural that on this day, primarily devoted to the consideration of an early period in our history, some thoughts should be given to the present and the future. For my own part, I am unable to agree with that view frequently expressed which finds little to admire in the present and which contemplates the present chiefly to point a warning as to the future. Despite the fact that the times have changed, and that the conditions are different, the principles of our government are the same. We are not to fear comparison with the past. The contemporaneous history of a hundred or more years shows that the principles of our government have been affirmed and that the people have been able to maintain them.

It is not natural that on this day, primarily devoted to the consideration of an early period in our history, some thoughts should be given to the present and the future. For my own part, I am unable to agree with that view frequently expressed which finds little to admire in the present and which contemplates the present chiefly to point a warning as to the future. Despite the fact that the times have changed, and that the conditions are different, the principles of our government are the same. We are not to fear comparison with the past. The contemporaneous history of a hundred or more years shows that the principles of our government have been affirmed and that the people have been able to maintain them.

It is not natural that on this day, primarily devoted to the consideration of an early period in our history, some thoughts should be given to the present and the future. For my own part, I am unable to agree with that view frequently expressed which finds little to admire in the present and which contemplates the present chiefly to point a warning as to the future. Despite the fact that the times have changed, and that the conditions are different, the principles of our government are the same. We are not to fear comparison with the past. The contemporaneous history of a hundred or more years shows that the principles of our government have been affirmed and that the people have been able to maintain them.

It is not natural that on this day, primarily devoted to the consideration of an early period in our history, some thoughts should be given to the present and the future. For my own part, I am unable to agree with that view frequently expressed which finds little to admire in the present and which contemplates the present chiefly to point a warning as to the future. Despite the fact that the times have changed, and that the conditions are different, the principles of our government are the same. We are not to fear comparison with the past. The contemporaneous history of a hundred or more years shows that the principles of our government have been affirmed and that the people have been able to maintain them.

It is not natural that on this day, primarily devoted to the consideration of an early period in our history, some thoughts should be given to the present and the future. For my own part, I am unable to agree with that view frequently expressed which finds little to admire in the present and which contemplates the present chiefly to point a warning as to the future. Despite the fact that the times have changed, and that the conditions are different, the principles of our government are the same. We are not to fear comparison with the past. The contemporaneous history of a hundred or more years shows that the principles of our government have been affirmed and that the people have been able to maintain them.

It is not natural that on this day, primarily devoted to the consideration of an early period in our history, some thoughts should be given to the present and the future. For my own part, I am unable to agree with that view frequently expressed which finds little to admire in the present and which contemplates the present chiefly to point a warning as to the future. Despite the fact that the times have changed, and that the conditions are different, the principles of our government are the same. We are not to fear comparison with the past. The contemporaneous history of a hundred or more years shows that the principles of our government have been affirmed and that the people have been able to maintain them.

BEFORE DURING AFTER

Immediate lasting efficacious agreeable Sold at All Druggists Everywhere Avoid Substitutes

upon him by influential journals and publications, beside which the faintest praise of the republic is not to be found. Our own generation, however, has not only understood the public sentiment of a century ago, which in all parts of the country counted the republic as the best of all governments, but has also understood the public sentiment of a century ago, which in all parts of the country counted the republic as the best of all governments.

It is not natural that on this day, primarily devoted to the consideration of an early period in our history, some thoughts should be given to the present and the future. For my own part, I am unable to agree with that view frequently expressed which finds little to admire in the present and which contemplates the present chiefly to point a warning as to the future. Despite the fact that the times have changed, and that the conditions are different, the principles of our government are the same. We are not to fear comparison with the past. The contemporaneous history of a hundred or more years shows that the principles of our government have been affirmed and that the people have been able to maintain them.

It is not natural that on this day, primarily devoted to the consideration of an early period in our history, some thoughts should be given to the present and the future. For my own part, I am unable to agree with that view frequently expressed which finds little to admire in the present and which contemplates the present chiefly to point a warning as to the future. Despite the fact that the times have changed, and that the conditions are different, the principles of our government are the same. We are not to fear comparison with the past. The contemporaneous history of a hundred or more years shows that the principles of our government have been affirmed and that the people have been able to maintain them.

It is not natural that on this day, primarily devoted to the consideration of an early period in our history, some thoughts should be given to the present and the future. For my own part, I am unable to agree with that view frequently expressed which finds little to admire in the present and which contemplates the present chiefly to point a warning as to the future. Despite the fact that the times have changed, and that the conditions are different, the principles of our government are the same. We are not to fear comparison with the past. The contemporaneous history of a hundred or more years shows that the principles of our government have been affirmed and that the people have been able to maintain them.

It is not natural that on this day, primarily devoted to the consideration of an early period in our history, some thoughts should be given to the present and the future. For my own part, I am unable to agree with that view frequently expressed which finds little to admire in the present and which contemplates the present chiefly to point a warning as to the future. Despite the fact that the times have changed, and that the conditions are different, the principles of our government are the same. We are not to fear comparison with the past. The contemporaneous history of a hundred or more years shows that the principles of our government have been affirmed and that the people have been able to maintain them.

It is not natural that on this day, primarily devoted to the consideration of an early period in our history, some thoughts should be given to the present and the future. For my own part, I am unable to agree with that view frequently expressed which finds little to admire in the present and which contemplates the present chiefly to point a warning as to the future. Despite the fact that the times have changed, and that the conditions are different, the principles of our government are the same. We are not to fear comparison with the past. The contemporaneous history of a hundred or more years shows that the principles of our government have been affirmed and that the people have been able to maintain them.

It is not natural that on this day, primarily devoted to the consideration of an early period in our history, some thoughts should be given to the present and the future. For my own part, I am unable to agree with that view frequently expressed which finds little to admire in the present and which contemplates the present chiefly to point a warning as to the future. Despite the fact that the times have changed, and that the conditions are different, the principles of our government are the same. We are not to fear comparison with the past. The contemporaneous history of a hundred or more years shows that the principles of our government have been affirmed and that the people have been able to maintain them.

It is not natural that on this day, primarily devoted to the consideration of an early period in our history, some thoughts should be given to the present and the future. For my own part, I am unable to agree with that view frequently expressed which finds little to admire in the present and which contemplates the present chiefly to point a warning as to the future. Despite the fact that the times have changed, and that the conditions are different, the principles of our government are the same. We are not to fear comparison with the past. The contemporaneous history of a hundred or more years shows that the principles of our government have been affirmed and that the people have been able to maintain them.

It is not natural that on this day, primarily devoted to the consideration of an early period in our history, some thoughts should be given to the present and the future. For my own part, I am unable to agree with that view frequently expressed which finds little to admire in the present and which contemplates the present chiefly to point a warning as to the future. Despite the fact that the times have changed, and that the conditions are different, the principles of our government are the same. We are not to fear comparison with the past. The contemporaneous history of a hundred or more years shows that the principles of our government have been affirmed and that the people have been able to maintain them.

It is not natural that on this day, primarily devoted to the consideration of an early period in our history, some thoughts should be given to the present and the future. For my own part, I am unable to agree with that view frequently expressed which finds little to admire in the present and which contemplates the present chiefly to point a warning as to the future. Despite the fact that the times have changed, and that the conditions are different, the principles of our government are the same. We are not to fear comparison with the past. The contemporaneous history of a hundred or more years shows that the principles of our government have been affirmed and that the people have been able to maintain them.

It is not natural that on this day, primarily devoted to the consideration of an early period in our history, some thoughts should be given to the present and the future. For my own part, I am unable to agree with that view frequently expressed which finds little to admire in the present and which contemplates the present chiefly to point a warning as to the future. Despite the fact that the times have changed, and that the conditions are different, the principles of our government are the same. We are not to fear comparison with the past. The contemporaneous history of a hundred or more years shows that the principles of our government have been affirmed and that the people have been able to maintain them.

It is not natural that on this day, primarily devoted to the consideration of an early period in our history, some thoughts should be given to the present and the future. For my own part, I am unable to agree with that view frequently expressed which finds little to admire in the present and which contemplates the present chiefly to point a warning as to the future. Despite the fact that the times have changed, and that the conditions are different, the principles of our government are the same. We are not to fear comparison with the past. The contemporaneous history of a hundred or more years shows that the principles of our government have been affirmed and that the people have been able to maintain them.

It is not natural that on this day, primarily devoted to the consideration of an early period in our history, some thoughts should be given to the present and the future. For my own part, I am unable to agree with that view frequently expressed which finds little to admire in the present and which contemplates the present chiefly to point a warning as to the future. Despite the fact that the times have changed, and that the conditions are different, the principles of our government are the same. We are not to fear comparison with the past. The contemporaneous history of a hundred or more years shows that the principles of our government have been affirmed and that the people have been able to maintain them.

See that you get Diamond Dyes, and take nothing else.

Professional dyers always use different dyes for cotton than for wool, as cotton is a vegetable fibre, while wool comes from an animal. In Diamond Dyes there are some fifteen fast cotton colors, that are prepared especially for cotton and mixed goods. These dyes give colors that even washing in strong soap-suds or exposure to sunlight will not fade.