

SONGS IN PRINCESS CHIE

ONE OF THE GEMS TAKEN FROM THE SCORE OF THE OPERA
COMIQUE

CLEVER IDEAS AND WORDS

"The Love Light of Your Eyes"
Promises to Become Especially Popular—What the Story
Book Says.

A review of the score of "The Princess Chie" reveals a laudable scheme on the part of Kirtle La Salle, the librettist, to break away from the farce-comedy-extravaganza models, which have been so fully used of late years by writers of comic opera. He has evidently made an effort to bring this delightful form of entertainment back to the long-admired plane of opera comique, and those who like good music, when allied to romance and clean comedy, have, it is said, heartily recommended this work. The story is essentially a romantic one, the princess of the title being a beautiful female of the time of the great French Revolution, in the time of Charles the Bold is rich in the possibility of romance. The opera sounds of war, the chase and of love. One of the most beautiful songs, a trio, is sung by two brigand soldiers of fortune and a sly little court coquette. The soldiers are possessed of the idea that the fighting man is irresistible, and proceed to express their views to each other, the coquette injecting her own views on the subject in this wise:

When a damsel meets with a fighting man,
She always effects disdain;
She always bristles him, pretends that
She hates him.
And flouts him and flouts him; but
That is, if he can give check to her pique.
By showing her scorn is all in vain;
For the fighting man is the proper sort.
To win the heart of the damsel,
Fill me the meaning if you can,
Of the phrase so false, "a fighting man?"

A fighting man, a fighting man,
(When danger threatened away his ran).
He's quick with blade, he's never afraid
(At least when he meets a defenseless maid);
He'll never amiss with a smile or a kiss
(And he's often rewarded like this).

REFRAIN.

A fighting man, a fighting man,
He's built upon nature's finest plan;
A friend in a brawl,
A beau at a ball—
Oh, the world bows down to a fighting man.

Here is the song of "The Wood Nymph and the Water God," sung by the princess while disguised as a peasant girl in a scheme to win the heart of the duke.

A wood nymph lived in an old oak tree
On a river-bank in a forest fair,
And once on a time she chanced to see
A river god in the waters there.
She thrilled as she looked on his noble face

Her love she voiced in a joyous song,
And he was enraptured with her grace
And worshipped her from the reeds among.

Poor little nymph in her old oak tree,
Poor river god in the crystal wave,
He would have loved in the wood to be,
And she in the heart of the old oak tree.
So she pined and pined with many a sigh,
And he longed and longed for his wood nymph.

What could they do? What could they do?
Her love to him did she sweetly give,
His passion for her was plain to see,
And she in the heart of the old oak tree.
So she pined and pined with many a sigh,
And he longed and longed for his wood nymph.

Her love to him did she sweetly give,
His passion for her was plain to see,
And she in the heart of the old oak tree.
So she pined and pined with many a sigh,
And he longed and longed for his wood nymph.

What could they do? What could they do?
Her love to him did she sweetly give,
His passion for her was plain to see,
And she in the heart of the old oak tree.
So she pined and pined with many a sigh,
And he longed and longed for his wood nymph.
