CAMPING OUT IN MINNESOTA

What to Do With the Children During Vacation.

NO. 2. SPORTS AND GAMES. The outdoor life gives ample scope for youthful activity, manifested in running, jumping, swimming, boating, etc. Kite-flying can be indulged in; marks shot at with blow guns, with slings, bows and arrows; tests of strength and agility can be made in tug-of-war, in leap frog, in pitching quoits, climbing trees, in playing ball and scores of other games known to boys. Swings can be put up, hammocks swung and see-saws made, and no end of healthful and pleasurable pastime obtained at no cost except a little head work and beneficial muscular exercise. Encourage observation in the children and take pains to answer their questions. Their "Whats" and "What fors" are the keys with which they try to unlock the hidden treasures of the new world they have come to live in. Thompson says: "In children a great curiosity is well. Who have themselves to learn, and all the world."

shining silver. At first he hops along the bank, occasionally dipping his beak in very carefully; then, hopping to a stone, partially submerged, he dipped his head in, splashing the water over his back, then having fully made up his mind, he hopped off into the water, ducking his head and using his wings vigorously, allowing his feathers to "float" about his body, swelling to twice the natural size, thus allowing the water to reach every part of his body. After a few vigorous splashes he sought the stone, and after waiting a minute or two plunged in again and again. Then selecting a branch on the sunny side of a tree he perched thereon, dressing his feathers with his beak and shaking off the surplus water in showers. In a few minutes he had taken his bath, pressed and settled his feathers without the aid of comb or brush and was ready to join in the general concert given by the other birds of the wildwood—most or all of whom have also taken a bath some time during the day, and which they repeat day after day.

NATURE STUDY. The field for the study of natural history is unlimited. The botanist will find plants, flowers, clinging vines and fern life in a hundred delicate forms, and mighty trees, whose lofty branches shade long-perished races, in whose mounds the archaeologist can delve and read from bones and rude pottery the story of the past. For the ornithologist, with gun and glass, birds abound in countless numbers. The haunts, notes and habits of the feathered tribes can be studied with an ease and freedom hardly equaled anywhere else in the country. The entomologist, with net and collecting boxes and bottle, will not find as many flying, crawling and swimming things as in the tropics, but material is not lacking for immediate instruction and future study. The geologist, too, with pick and hammer, can work among ancient rocks,

Great boulders, torn from their native beds by the mighty glaciers, are scattered over the prairies, while the shores of the lakes abound in agates, carnelians and other pretty stones, each telling the story of the turmoil of world building. According to the investigations of Prof. Winchell and McMillan, of the state university, there are 1,750 seed-producing plants, 85 species and varieties of ferns, 700 mosses and liverworts, 2,500 fungi, 800 algae and 250 lichens in Minnesota, and the work of collection is by no means finished. There are nearly 120 different kinds of forest trees, including the oak, maple, ash, pine, poplar, birch, willow, beech, elm, walnut, butternut, cherry, plum, etc. There are hundreds of shrubs and vines, and of the grasses, native and introduced, and a few more worthy of study and attention. Birds appear in a great variety of costumes and shapes and are present everywhere. They come to our doorsteps and give us song, and their doings in the woods and remote places are full of surprises to every student of nature. Birds are mentioned many times in the Bible, and no less than twenty references are made to their nests. There is a charm about the nest of a bird that does not linger about the hive of the wild bees, the burrow of the woodchuck, or the dome of the muskrat. It is more of a home than any of them. No animal seems more akin to man because of its beautiful home life, and the loving care with which it anticipates and provides for its brood. Civilization has made an effort to increase the number of song birds, to which law and humanity have extended protection, by exterminating the savage varieties and widening the opportunities for getting food. Botany can be made a profitable and interesting study for children as well as adults. What a wealth of sweetness and beauty is spread around us! What pleasures can be derived from flowers, from musical sounds, from the forms of trees. "Not a tree, A plant, a leaf, a blossom but contains A folio volume. We may read and read, And read again, and still find something new. Something to please, and something to instruct." Flowers have been, to the poets in all ages and in all countries, a never failing source of inspiration. An interesting study, too, is the tribes of plant life lower than the flowers—in the mosses and ferns, of which there are hundreds of varieties in Minnesota, whose humble life on land corresponds with that of the coral insect and sponge in the sea.

The interesting labor of preserving objects of natural history can be carried on in the pure air of Minnesota much easier than in the hot and damper atmosphere of the South or East. Persons of artistic taste may learn much of the art of preparing and mounting the skins of birds and animals in likable attitudes while in camp by giving the matter proper care and industry.

HINTS FOR COLLECTORS. The making of natural history collections is a most entertaining and instructive way of amusing and benefiting children. An outfit need not be expensive. A good light box, with close cover and fitted with shelves or divisions, should be the exclusive property of each young collector. The shelves can be fitted with small boxes; cigar, chalk or spool boxes or bottles will answer admirably for insects, shells, stones, seeds, etc., while old books may be used in making a collection of pressed plants. A boy, named, who made a collection of seeds and leaves when a boy, was able in after years to give a history of hundreds of plants from merely looking at his mate collection. All collections should be labeled with the date, name, locality where found, peculiarities, etc. Different kinds of woods, showing the grain and bark, make an interesting collection. A history of the uses of the tree can also be made. Insects can be pinned in cigar boxes, with date, locality and name written on a small stiff piece of white paper, and placed on the pin under the insect. A man now known to the world as a scientist made, while a boy, a collection consisting of the skeletons of nearly all of the smaller native mammals, birds and reptiles. Many were mounted, the bones being fastened together with fine wire. This young enthusiast could readily place the separated bones in the position in which they belonged, describe the modifications of the same bone in different animals to subserve their various modes of life, explain the forms of teeth of the flesh eater, the insect-eater or the vegetable eater. In fact, he could make even skeletons so interesting that their ghostliness was overlooked, and only the beautiful work of the master architect appeared to the eye of the beholder. The national museum at Washington contains the mounted skeleton of every known form of beast, bird, fish and reptile.

A college museum in an Eastern state has a cabinet containing many different specimens of insect architecture, the colored cells of the carpenter bee, the cups of firm masonry built by the mud wasp, waxen cells of bees and paper ones of hornets, houses of the finest of spun silk, and coarsely made cocoons of chips and earth. This collection was the gift of a twelve-year-old girl and the collecting and labeling were entirely her own work. Prof. Luger, of the Minnesota state experimental station, whose recent death leaves a void among scientific workers, had a collection of 15,000 beetles. He says parents do not attach enough importance to a study of insect and plant life, which offers a world of interest to children, if their attention is turned in that direction.

FIVE ARE BADLY INJURED.

Temporary Grand Stand, Crowded With People, Collapses. CHICAGO, June 15.—A temporary grandstand at Sixty-eighth street and Stewart avenue, built for the purpose of accommodating spectators for the annual field day sports of the Chicago normal schools, collapsed today, injuring twenty-five persons, mostly women and children. Several were seriously hurt, but it is thought none will die. A partial list of the injured follows: Mrs. B. Zekler, spine injured. Mrs. J. O. Wallace, cut about limbs. Mrs. R. Coleman, internal injuries. Mrs. T. Fisher, spine injured and head cut. Annie Crisley, ten years old; leg broken. The stand, which was 100 feet long and seven tiers high, was crowded. The programs of the day was fairly under way when, on account of the general stamping of feet in recognition of some meritorious athletic accomplishment, the support gave way, precipitating the spectators to the ground, several feet below. Several hundred persons were buried under the timbers. The field events came to an abrupt ending and the parade was joined in the work of rescue. The injured were removed to the normal school nearby, which was converted into a temporary hospital, with more than a score of physicians and surgeons in attendance. Princeton, N. J.—E. C. Osborn, treasurer of Princeton university since 1885, died here from apoplexy. Mr. Osborn was to have been married Monday next.
