The Globe's Daily Short Story

Tripping the Anchor

By FRANK H. SWEET

Copyright, 1902, by Daily Story Pub. Co. A small, sloop-rigged yacht was lying at anchor near the north end of Prudence Island.

Although there were no signs of a storm, an already stiff breeze was freshening down the river, and the yacht was rocked and tossed under the counter influence of the winds and currents which swept round the end of the island.

The persons leaning over the gunwales looked up hastily, but the steamer was too far away to occasion alarm, and they once more became intent on their sport.

It was only when they heard a smooth cry, and saw a sudden commotion on the deck of the steamer, that they became aware of the accident. But they had little time for alarm. A little form shot from the steamer's side, and almost before they realized the danger, it was past. A few powerful strokes and the swimmer was beside the child; a few moments later and they were both on board the yacht.

"Yes, yes, excellent! Of course you must accept our hospitality! Why, God bless me, sir, everything on board is yours. Didn't you save Bobby?"

"I am afraid I shall have to thank you for your hospitality for a few hours," he said, with a significant motion toward the vanishing steamer. "My boat doesn't seem to think it worth while to wait for me. Fishing, God! I take it!"

"I couldn't have arranged it better myself," he declared emphatically, "only it's a strange we should have been so careless. Dear, dear! to think the boy might have been drowned! However," brightening, "it's all gone by now, and we've got you to keep us cheerful. Of course, you'll stay with us a few days?"

"I am very sorry," replied Mr. Smith, regretfully, "but I shall have to beg you to put me ashore at Jamestown or Newport. All my baggage was on board the steamer."

"Oh, it's all right, then. We'll send for it." "No, no, I really must refuse. You see, I have written to friends at Newport, and they are expecting me."

"Mr. Gleeson looked annoyed. 'Well, anyhow, you'll spend a few weeks with us at the summer cottage, won't you?' he asked. 'We'll be down there in a week or ten days now.'"

"Certainly, I shall be very glad," was the reply. "I expect to be in this part of the country several months, and will have plenty of time at my disposal. Where is your cottage?"

"Newport—Newport, of course. Over near the rocks," Mr. Smith looked interested. "Why, the friends I am going to visit are named Gleeson, and their cottage is at Newport," he exclaimed. "What a coincidence!"

"Oh, I don't know," said Mr. Gleeson, indifferently. "The name is common at Newport. Some are relatives and some are not."

"It was late in the evening when they entered Newport harbor. As they approached the wharf Mr. Gleeson turned suddenly to his guest.

"I believe I have told you how we came to be out yachting just now," he said, with a whimsical glance at Maud, who sat beside him. "We don't usually go till September."

"Papa," she remonstrated. "Oh, it's all right, my dear," he said, good-naturedly. "Mr. Smith will understand. Anybody would have done the same under like circumstances, and besides it's something of a joke, although it reflects somewhat on our hospitality. You see, Mr. Smith," throwing his head comfortably back upon his hands and stretching his legs to their full length, "I met an old college friend in Chicago last year, and he said he was going to send his boy East after awhile. I didn't prove very responsive, for I had heard something of that same boy—a wild, drunken desperado, who rode wild horses and shot Indians on sight."

"Papa, we didn't hear that he drank." "Just the same, my dear, we heard that he was a drunkard. He was nearly as bad as the ranch, and that he used a bowie knife as a toothpick. If that doesn't mean whisky and all the rest of it, I don't know. Well, the upshot of it was I received a letter this spring stating that he was coming to Newport to spend the summer. Fancy! The summer! And he was going to make my house his home. A demonic cow-boy, in shirt-sleeves and cowhide boots, spending the summer in my house! Probably he would pick his initials in my front door with his bowie knife and fill the fence posts with his bullets. Very likely he would bring his lariat and lasso my girls as they went in and out. 'Right! What could I do?'"

"Nothing—except go yachting," laughed Mr. Smith. "Exactly. That's what I thought. If it had only been the reprobate boy who with a combed-in wig had been all right, but there was the father. I didn't wish to offend him. However, if I was off yachting, I should know of the boy's arrival, nobody could take offense, could they?"

"No—unless perhaps the boy should happen to drop down on your yacht from a passing steamer and hear some such lively description of himself as you have given me."
