filling of meat may be used. For the meat filling, which is very nice, use finely chopped roast beef, a pound of fat, a teaspoon of pepper, a small clove of garlic, minced fine, and a brandy sauce.

Onions, sweet herbs or any preferred seasoning may be used instead of the garlic.

To cook it put a fourth of a cup of dipping into the roaster, heat thoroughly, then add the meat, dredged well with flour. Brown on all sides.

The Globe's Daily Short Story

By H. A. HOSMER.

Copyright, 1902, by Daily Story Pub. Co.

Outside was the gray, cold twilight of winter's day. But inside the great stone house was warm and cheerful.

In the luxurious comfort of her favorite library corner a woman sat gazing dreamily into the red embers of the grate fire.

Marian Read was one to whom all the comforts and luxuries of the world had been granted. The golden spoon had been hers from her birth.

As she sat looking into the embers she saw not the red coals at all, but her eye was filled with a picture which had stirred her heart that afternoon as she had wandered through one of the art galleries of the great city.

Amlessly and with the languid air of one surfeited with the beautiful things of the earth she had drifted, as she often did, through the great crowd of the art galleries.

It was but the painted picture of a little child—a child of nature, and not one of fancy. It was a face beautiful in the truest sense of the word; beautiful in the straight-out look from those great brown eyes, denoting a perfect confidence in self; beautiful in the promise of perfect manhood which the childish face betokened; beautiful in coloring and perfect in contour.

For a long time she had stood before the "Portrait of a Child," and many thoughts and yearnings had come to the lonely woman as she stood there. The mother heart was strong within her, and yet it seemed as if the years were speeding past her and her life so full of all the material things of the world, was going to miss the fullest and ripest fulfillment.

As she sat by the fire this winter afternoon all of the many things which that sweet baby face had suggested to her came back to her mind before her, and things and people of whom she had not thought for many years came again before her mental vision.

As a girl she had held very high ideals of marriage and of the home and the children resulting therefrom. These "notions," as they were always called by her parents, had been held well in check during her life-time by the perfect conventionalities of her mother, who was rigid in her devotion to society, and whose only criterion of good or bad was as to what "they" would say or think about it.

All the maternally latent in her being had gone out to this little image on the wall of all children's passions with her, every good woman to center their love and sympathy upon some living object, be it man or child or picture, had been kindled into life and was fast becoming a passion with her, putting purpose into her hitherto purposeless life.

Never before had her dainty garments trailed in such a direction, and it was a new experience for her to walk through this district of the city. She found the corner and near it, in the street, some children were playing. She scanned each face eagerly, but she failed to find one bearing a likeness to the picture.

She walked further on, scrutinizing the face of every child she came upon, but nowhere about the streets did she catch the picture boy. She came again the next confidence. His cheerful, self-sacrifice and undaunted spirit, finding sunshine where the rest of the world saw only shadow, and putting it into his pictures with nature's own colors—these qualities had first commanded the wholesome respect of this daughter of wealth. Then came admiration and then, though it was unconfessed even to herself for a long time, she gave him her heart though he did not know it.

When they came back there was no Shobden Ward at the old academy nor had she ever seen or heard of him since. But often had she thought of that brave boy whom she had loved and wondered how and where he fared and what his dreams and ambitions had led him.

Something in those soft brown eyes of the child's portrait had brought back to her those wonderful pictures, knitted eyes. The next day she went again to see the picture which had so won her heart, and she found it in the corner of the gallery where she had first seen it.

"Oh, is that the picture they are all making such a fuss about? Why, I know that child. I often see him. He lives in those tenements at the corner of Maple street and Lane Court. Yes, it is a good picture, but I don't see why people should make such a fuss about it."

"Ah," thought the slender, dainty woman in the scalbin and sweeping skirts, "that is where my little man lives, then."

All the maternally latent in her being had gone out to this little image on the wall of all children's passions with her, every good woman to center their love and sympathy upon some living object, be it man or child or picture, had been kindled into life and was fast becoming a passion with her, putting purpose into her hitherto purposeless life.

Never before had her dainty garments trailed in such a direction, and it was a new experience for her to walk through this district of the city. She found the corner and near it, in the street, some children were playing. She scanned each face eagerly, but she failed to find one bearing a likeness to the picture.

She walked further on, scrutinizing the face of every child she came upon, but nowhere about the streets did she catch the picture boy. She came again the next day, and again many days after, growing more eager in the search the more the object eluded her.

At last, one day, as she walked along, almost without hope now of finding him, of a sudden in a group of playing children, she saw a boy who bore the face and blood original of her picture, and even more
