

The Heritage of Sir W. V. Harcourt's Son

Special Foreign Service
LONDON, Dec. 10.—As the successor of the great man who died recently, Sir William Vernon Harcourt, his son, Lewis Vernon Harcourt is the subject of most interesting speculation.

In features he closely resembles his father at the same age, but he has none of the latter's masterful aggressiveness and love of conflict.

In one important respect he may be said not only to have followed his father's example, but to have bettered the instruction. Sir William's second wife, who survives him, is a charming and brilliant American woman.

Partisan friends were not more conspicuous than political foes at the memorial services held in Sir William Harcourt's honor.

Another American marriage had previously taken place among the Vernons, the titled branch of the family.

"I can't stand Harcourt," said a Liberal once, "he uses such strong language when you disagree with him."

He thrice refused a peerage. He even kicked at being knighted when appointed solicitor general.

Behind that lies a sad romance. When Col. Harcourt died he and Sir William despite their political differences were the best of friends.

The crowning disappointment of Sir William's life was his failure to attain the premiership.

"Par as I can learn," said the Pruntytown philosopher, with his usual flippancy, "the only difference—excepting, of course, in the size of their bills—between the fashionable city physician, with several mysterious initials after his name,
