Postage Stamps.

The average consumption of stamps in the United States is about 17,000,000 per day, and within a year this number would girdle the globe four times. Employees of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing work eight hours each day and in that length of time turn out from ten to twenty million postage stamps.

On certain occasions, when more stamps are demanded or a rush order is received, it has been found necessary to work day and night in the big print shop. Forty million stamps have been made in a single day of 24 hours.

The law requires that there be kept on hand in the storage vaults of the bureau of engraving and printing one hundred million one-cent stamps and twice that number of the two-cent denomination. Great care is needed to see that the number is not depleted. There has never been an occasion when the stamps on hand gave out, and it will probably never occur on account of the vast number manufactured each day. - Postmaster's Advocate.
