

Call a Halt on the "Moth Family"

A moth loves color.

A speck of dust or a slight stain on a suit of clothes is a bed of roses to him.

Whenever he spies a garment, he puts on full speed for the spot or the stain.

That's one reason why you should have your last season's suits cleaned before laying them aside for next year's use.

My repair department will remove all temptations for the whole Moth Family after that ordinary precautions will assure you a whole suit next season.

Also, your suit will be ready to put on when the first change in weather strikes us.

Beldane the Smith.

by Jeffry Farnol.

Beldane, the smith grew up in the wood under the care of Ambrose, the hermit who taught him woodcraft and ancient philosophy but sought to impress upon his mind that woman was to be avoided, that she was fickle and false.

One day Lady Helen of Mortaine in riding through the wood hears Beldane singing and stops to talk. Later she visits him and he tells her of his love. Then she tells him who she is and he deems his love hopeless.

Beldane goes to Ambrose and learns that he is the son of a duke and that his property has been almost all taken away so he set out to claim his own and to right the wrongs of his people.

It is a story of long ago when the country was ruled by might alone.

The story which is full of action, is unusually well told. It is the best thing this author has ever written and those who have read The Broad Highway, The Jester, and other writings will know that it is exceedingly good.

Nobody.

by Louis Joseph Vance

This is the story of a pretty but unsuccessful girl who is penniless and discouraged and she threatened to do something desperate. Fate aids her and she is clever enough to make the most of her chance. She is caught out on the roof in a thunder storm and in seeking shelter goes down the wrong trap door. There she encounters a burglar and saves the owners life. As a result she finds herself in the home of a wealthy society woman with plenty of pretty clothes but under an assumed name. The situation is a trying one and the adventures follow in rapid succession but the author gives the story a realistic touch that makes it intensely interesting.

Lot & Company.

by Will Livingston Comfort.

Routledge Rides Alone has been conceded to be the best thing this author has written and this, his latest product, reminds one of his first work.

The story is laid on deck of an old fashioned sailing vessel. The vessel is wrecked and for days a little boat drifts on the Pacific Ocean under the blazing sun with little to eat or drink.

It is a story of the call of the sea, of love and of adventure.

Blue Gingham Folks.

by Dorothy Donnell Calhoun.

This is a collection of short stories of New England folk. They are quaint little stories of home life, the kind that when the reader finishes they feel rested. They are full of quiet humor and will appeal to the parent with young people clamoring for something to read.
