Cloth has to be seasoned just the same as lumber. Both must have the warp and shrink taken out of them before they're fit to be built into anything. You know what a green beam will do to a floor—how it will pull it out of shape and draw it out of plumb—well, a piece of wool that isn't shrunk until there's no shrink in it, will begin to shrink when you begin to wear the suit, and then no matter how well it looks at the start, the collar will tug away, the lapel will shrivel and the breast will show furrows.

Koock's Clothes

are all made of fabrics thoroughly shrunk by the London process. When you buy a Koock suit you buy satisfaction, you buy a first-to-last-day perfect fit.
