MR. KANNIFERSTAN. FROM THE GERMAN.

Perhaps you do not know that in Germany, when a boy has mastered a trade, he spends a certain time in traveling about from town to town, and learning at each place something more about his business. He need not have much money to do this; every one feels bound to help such travelers, either with food, or shelter, or a few pence—it is the custom of the land.

So it came about that a little German boy found himself one day in the streets of Amsterdam, looking in wonder at the busy people, the splendid houses and the great ships. One house in particular struck him, it was so large and magnificent, with six chimneys in the roof, its bay windows, and its handsome stone work. He could not resist asking a passer-by about it.

"Good friend," said he, "can you tell me the name of the gentleman who owns the beautiful house with flowers in the window?"

Now this man understood exactly as much of German as our little traveler did of Dutch, namely, nothing at all; and, besides, he was in a hurry, so he answered shortly and snappishly, "Kanniferstan," and passed on.

Now this is a Dutch word, or rather three, to speak correctly, which translated means, "I don't understand you." But our little stranger took it to mean the name of the gentleman he had asked for.

"He must be a rich man, this Mr. Kanniferstan," he thought to himself as he gazed at the tulips, and the china vases, and the double stocks in the balcony. And then a foolish longing came into his head to be this wealthy gentleman; but he was not really a silly boy, so he shook his head a bit, and the fancy fell out, and he went on his way.

Presently he came to the docks, where the great ships stood side by side, mast by mast; and there our traveler's eyes nearly started out of his head with wonder. One great ship, just returned from the East Indies, specially attracted him; out of its depths came such countless chests, and bundles, and casks—sugar and pepper, rice and coffee; whom could all these treasures be for? As the question rose in his mind it found its way to his lips. A great brawny fellow, with a chest upon his shoulders, took upon him self to answer:

"Kanniferstan," said he. "Ha, ha!" said the boy, "now I see it. No wonder he can build fine houses on the land when such good things come to him over the sea. What a poor little wretched fellow I feel among all this wealth and splendor! If only I could be like this Mr. Kanniferstan!"

Just as these foolish thoughts were once again taking possession of his head a funeral procession came by—a very grand one; four solemn black horses drawing a carriage, also hung with black, slowly and sadly, as if they knew that they were taking the dead to his last sleeping place. A long train of friends and acquaintances followed, two and two, and shrouded in black garments. In the distance a bell was tolling. Our stranger boy stood aside, hat in hand, for the train to pass; and saw feeling stole over him as he gazed. Then he touched the cloak of the last mourner.

"Pardon," said the boy, "but this must surely be the funeral of some good friend to you all, that you walk so sorrowfully, and that yonder bell sounds so sadly, tell me, please, his name."

"Kanniferstan," was the answer. "Poor Kanniferstan!" he exclaimed; "what is now left to you of your riches? Only what I, poor boy that I am, shall have too—a grave; and of all your sweet flowers, just rosemary on your coffin!"

With those thoughts he followed the funeral as if he were one of the mourners; saw the supposed Mr. Kanniferstan lowered into his last home, and was more touched by the words of the Dutch preacher, who he could not understand, than by those of many a German pastor in former days, to which he had given little heed. When the crowd dispersed, he too went away; and being tired and hungry, he entered an inn, where, happily, they spoke German. Here he ate with good appetite some bread and cheese and felt refreshed. His envious thoughts all vanished, and if he is tempted again to murmur that so many people in the world are rich while he is poor, he has only to think of Mr. Kanniferstan, in Amsterdam, his splendid house, his treasure-bringing ships, and his narrow grave.—Christian Weekly.

BUFFALO NURSERY, TROY, LINCOLN COUNTY, MO. BROTHER FARMERS, LOOK TO YOUR INTEREST. Remember how your older neighbors are lamenting because they did not set out a large orchard years ago.

I appeal to you to know why you continue to run the nice rolling piece of ground in wheat and corn until it is washed and in such a condition that it is not fit to farm, and you can't set trees on it to any advantage.

My stock of Trees is larger and finer than usual. I have a large lot of 3 and 4 years old Janettings. I have a fine lot of Oage and Silver Leaf Maple, with a General Variety of Nursery Stock.

Those wishing to plant Strawberries should attend to it at the first good season if they wish a full crop next year. Those wishing to set an orchard, if short of means, will be allowed 3 months time or more if desired, by giving note with good security or satisfactory references. Call and examine my stock. A. M. SHULTS. August 24, 1871.
