Edward VII. Speech Writer.
An amusing aftermath of King Edward's Parisian visit comes in the form of the following story, says Harper's Weekly. The king, whom limitless practice in the long years of his belated apprenticeship made an expert in speech-making, invariably composes his orations on the spot and delivers them off-hand. But mere reporters are not admitted to state banquets such as that given at the Elysee in Paris to the king by the president of the French republic. It followed that when the king was asked for the text of his speech for subsequent publication no text was forthcoming. His majesty had finally to follow the course of lesser mortals and write out his speech himself. And exactly the same thing occurred at the Hotel de Ville. In this case the delayed telegram begging for the speech only reached his majesty at Portmouth, and he had there and then to set to and write it. One wonders what became of those two pieces of copy and whether they will appear in the archives of the future.
