UNCONSCIOUS AT THE WHEEL.

Accident to Engine Driver Nearly Causes a Wreck.

New York, Aug. 13.—Through the prompt action of Trainman George Simmons, who put on the emergency brake and then climbed on the engine and shut off the steam, a train used to convey conductors, trainmen, engineers and firemen to the North White Plains yard of the Harlem railroad was saved from running away, with an insensible fireman at the throttle.

The train consisted of one coach and an engine, and there were a dozen employees in the car who were being taken to work. Engineer Way was in the train dispatcher's office while Fireman Frank Warner ran the train south to the cross over below the station and started on the north bound track.

The train failed to stop at the station. Trainman Simmons, on looking out of the coach door, saw the fireman hanging out of the cab window, insensible and bleeding from a deep gash on the back of his skull. He turned on the emergency brake, and yet when the air was released the runaway train started on again. There was considerable excitement among the railroad men until Simmons crawled into the cab and shut off the steam.

Trainman F. J. Brooker took Fireman Warner, who was unconscious, to the White Plains hospital. Warner is unable to tell how he was injured, but it is believed his head first struck against a mail crane while he was looking at a signal.
