LEMONADE THE LATEST DIET

Curious Food Fad of a Club of Women in Portugal.

"The only way to prevent poverty is to convince persons that it is unnecessary for them to eat." So says the Baroness Stenmel, and, what is more, she practices what she preaches, says the Chicago Record-Herald. For many years the baroness resided in one of the Baule provinces, but recently she removed to Lisbon, and there she formed, with several other women, a club, the members of which have pledged themselves not to eat anything. Two glasses of lemonade a day every member may indulge in, but nothing more.

The baroness says that she has lived a long time on this daily allowance of lemonade, and she defies doctors to prove that she is not as healthy and as vigorous as any ordinary woman of her age. Solid food, she claims, does much more harm than good, and she warns every one who desires to become a member of the club that instant expulsion will be her fate if she dares to eat even as much as a mouthful of bread.

In this strange experiment both the Lisbon doctors and restaurant keepers are much interested and for obvious reasons.

DOGS TO HELP WOUNDED.

Italian Officers Train Collies to Take Them For Use in War.

The use to which dogs have been put by the monks of the Hospice of St. Bernard, in the Alps, in searching for lost persons and administering most urgent aid in the shape of cordials and food has suggested to the Italian army the training of dogs to discover wounded soldiers and to bring to them the water and stimulants they may need after long exposure in the field, writes the Rome correspondent of the New York World.

At the recent maneuvers of the Italian army, which took place near Venice, several collies which have been educated by the officers were tried for the purpose of discovering hidden soldiers lying supposedly wounded in the least accessible points of the field, and wonderful was the sagacity displayed by them in searching for the wounded and gently lying beside them in order to offer the cordials they carried in flasks tied around their necks.
