JUDGE PARKER GAINING GROUND

In spite of his clamorous reticence regarding himself and his position Judge Parker is gaining strength in the dismembered Democratic party. The disinclination to talk, such as he has shown in times past, generally results fatally when the person comes to ask for political preferment. But strangely enough the reverse is being shown in this case. Parker is actually gaining ground as each day goes by, and that in spite of the fact that he is maintaining and has maintained a silence which is oppressive. Parker has been taxed with being on the fence and with having no fixed determination as to policy, yet the members of his party are flocking to him. There is no stampeding, no excitement, no undue influence, but there is a quiet turning in the tide Parkerward. Parker is not responsible for this rather unexpected turn, but Hearst and Bryan are. They have of their own actions driven a section of the party to the opposite side. All that Parker has to do is to stand with open arms. The twins do the rest. The candidacy of William R. Hearst for the Democratic nomination has driven the conservatives to a man who admittedly had no strength, and who, while not discredited, was without favor with a large proportion of Democrats throughout all sections of the country. Cleveland falling them, and Olney being scarcely considered, Judge Parker has, of necessity, become the choice of a great number. And from a position near the tail of the kite he is being swept forward without effort on his own part. Still Parker says nothing. Parker, the sphinx.

The worm turns. Fourteen negroes working for a Richmond, Virginia, company, refused to work with a white man. There is as much logic in their refusal to work with the po' white trash as in the opposite case. The fact that the whole fourteen were discharged for the one white man displays the temper of the southern employer, however.

A Cincinnati man is afflicted like a good many people you run across. He is able to speak but can't say anything. His throat is partially paralyzed; the others emit a profusion of words from unparalyzed throats and the result is the same.

What's that? Five government liquor licenses in St. Johnsbury? The original and only "illy white" town in Vermont! Get out!—Hardwick Gazette.

Sb, don't speak louder than a whisiper.

There is no better time than the present to clean up about your premises. The results are guaranteed to be satisfactory.

Was Bryan squelched by the decision of the New Haven judges? Oh, no, he bobs up like a piece of cork.
