NATIONAL BISCUIT COMPANY

A SOLDIER'S SURRENDER

Colonel Adolbert Ammon was one of the most popular officers in the army. There was only one trouble with the colonel—he had a hobby. He didn't believe in an army of men being tied to an army of women. "A soldier," he used to say, "should give his heart to the service, not to a woman and children." The truth is that the colonel was a very tender hearted man, and the reason underlying his hobby was that it was often painful for him to administer the army regulations where the families of the officers and men were made to suffer. When a body of his troops was ordered on a dangerous duty the colonel at the time of their departure for duty would shut himself up in his quarters rather than witness the wistful glances passing between husband and wife or father and daughter as the force marched away.

No such reason for his opposition to soldiers' families was given by the colonel. He would have been ashamed to admit that he had any tenderness beneath his rugged exterior. He put it all on the requirements of the service, contending that the service required men who loved to fight rather than men who loved women.

The colonel by virtue of his rank commanded two posts in the far west, with his headquarters at one of them. Gradually he effected the transfer of every married officer to the remote post, so that at last the one was full of women and children, while the other was full of bachelors. Then the colonel was happy. He lived among soldiers and soldiers alone.

One day Colonel Ammon was ordered to report in person at Washington. He was gone four months, and when he returned there was a sensation in his district. He brought a wife with him. Great interest was manifested by his officers to know how the colonel would get out of a complication he had brought upon himself. There was not a woman at his headquarters who was a suitable associate for his wife. All knew that sooner or later something must be done. Would their commander retransfer the married officers from the other post or change his headquarters to that post? He must do one or the other or his wife would lead a lonely life.

The colonel was oblivious to the fact that any such problem awaited him. His experience in such matters was very limited. He supposed his honeymoon would last forever, and just so long would his wife be contented with him for a companion. He had realized the position of one holding his peculiar views taking a wife, but had not foreseen anything more serious. When the couple reached their destination and Mrs. Ammon saw the situation, she notified her husband that there was trouble in store for them.

What was to be done? The colonel decided to transfer headquarters, though the wife had misgivings as to her reception and intimated as much to her husband.

It was 5 o'clock on a pleasant summer afternoon when the pair drove up in an ambulance—the only available conveyance—to the gateway of the post and thence across the parade. Usually at that hour the officers' families, dressed for dinner and the evening, were either lounging on their porches or on the benches lining the parade.

The colonel paled. Not a woman or a child was to be seen. His wife was to be ostracized. Powerful as he was as a commander of men, he could not order a woman to associate with her. He realized at last the consequences of indulging his hobby and groaned. Mrs. Ammon, rising to the occasion, made every effort to comfort her husband. Comfort! One might as well have tried to comfort a condemned criminal.

The pair dined in solitude. There was no occasion for any of the officers to report to the colonel till the next morning, and after dinner he sat silent, the picture of despair. Not a sound came from the officers' quarters near by nor across the parade except an occasional bugle call. It seemed an age before taps, and when it came, a lonely, melancholy sound, the colonel wished that it was sounded over his grave.

The last bugle note had scarcely died away when right under the colonel's window the post band started up "Johnny Comes Marching Home." At the same moment his door was thrust open and a troop of children poured in, each child bearing flowers, which they proceeded to heap upon the bride. Next came the officers' wives, who, after welcoming Mrs. Ammon, went to the colonel, and every woman kissed him on the cheek. Last of all the officers entered, with hearty congratulations. Scarcely had the throng offered their welcome when a pair of folding doors were thrown open and the servants of the officers living nearest were seen in the back room laying a table and opening wine.

The change of expression on the colonel's face was a study for a painter. Surprise, relief, pleasure, embarrassment, were all struggling for the mastery. His face was like the red stripes in the flag under which he served. On his wife's lips he saw a smile, and an unwilling shamefaced duplicate broke upon his own. Then, amid the noise of food and brass instruments without, the sizzle of voices within, the popping of gorks, the officer next in rank to the colonel, filling a glass of wine, held it up and said:

"Let us drink to our commander. He sent us away, as we all know, from the tenderness of his heart, and it is that same heart which has brought him to us. And here's to the bride who set that heart beating in the right direction."
