Mark Twain and Sir Henry.
A new story about Mark Twain is proffered to the readers of the current Harper's Weekly, and a good one it is for some people to recall on occasion. Mark was telling stories, strangely enough, and some young gentleman—Perkins, let us call him—after the manner of the very young, was trying to catch them, but he always began with that mock-modest preface: "You must have heard this before, Mr. Clemens," repeating the phrase at intervals through his so-called story. Finally Mark is said to have said this:
"Perkins, that's no way to tell a story. One night I was at supper with Henry Irwin, and he had the same old trick that you have, Perkins—'You must have heard this before'—or, 'you certainly have heard this.' He began a story this way and I said, politely, 'No, Irwin, I haven't,' though I didn't know what his story was about. After he had told this miserable phrase three times, I said to him: 'Irwin, I was born and raised in Missouri, where truth is at a discount and courtesy is above par. When a friend begins a story as you do with 'You must have heard this story,' court-spreavals, and we say no, no matter what the truth may be; and a second time we say no; but when it comes, like now, to the third time, then truth asserts herself. Yes, Irwin, I've heard your old chestnut many, many times before: I invented it.'"
