LOCOMOTIVES MEET HEAD ON

Passengers Shaken up on Central Vermont

AT POINT NEAR VERNON

No Orders to Express to Wait for Special, Which Was Train Crowded With People From Brattleboro Fair.

Brattleboro, Sept. 27.—Two locomotives were damaged in a head-on collision between Boston & Maine passenger train on the Central Vermont railroad near Vernon, three miles south of here last night. No passenger on either train was injured. The cars of both trains escaped with but little damage. The collision was between a southbound passenger train from Brattleboro carrying hundreds of people who had attended the Valley fair here yesterday, and a special consisting of an engine and three cars bound north from South Vernon. An error in the receipt of train orders is said to have been responsible for the accident. Conductor Griffin of the northbound train had orders to meet the express at Brattleboro, but no orders were delivered to the express to wait. The accident happened on a straight track.

Both engine crews, with the exception of engineer A. H. Hunter of Springfield, Mass., who was running the northbound train, jumped.

Although the collision occurred on the Central Vermont road, the trains were operated by the Connecticut River division of the Boston & Maine. The engineer of the southbound train, which was climbing a steep grade, saw the other approaching in time to apply his brakes and a very serious collision, although he could not wholly prevent the accident. The two locomotives were locked together and the platforms of some of the cars broken, but the passengers escaped severe injury, although many were knocked heavily against the seats and hurled from contusions. Special trains made up on each side of the wreck took the passengers to their destinations several hours after the collision.
