"Under Southern Skies" is now in its eighth successful season and has yet only been seen in a comparatively small portion of the country outside of the large cities. The increased enthusiasm with which the play is received on its return visits, indicates that Mrs. Parker's play will be one of the standard for many years to come. At the Barre opera house Friday evening, Feb. 12.

There's an elderly lady in Pennsylvania, who for a shade over forty years had lived her days in a big country house outside of Harrisburg without once having done a thing that could cause the minister, or even the minister's wife, to raise an eyebrow. Then came the temptation. She went to the theatre one night while in Harrisburg. In justice to her it must be admitted she went under protest. But this, though the first indiscretion, was not to be the last. For after that first lapse, which was about fifteen years ago, she contracted a habit to go twice each year. To date she has the record of having attended a total of thirty performances—"The Old Homestead" twice, and Lyman H. Howe's "Life-orama" twenty-eight times. At the Barre opera house Wednesday evening, Feb. 10.
