The Goddard seminary student, whose oratorical antics disturbed the early morning slumbers of Merchant street people and caused one woman to telephone for police protection from a "crazy man," cordially invites the people of Merchant street to attend the Goddard commencement exercises and hear the finished product. He learned through yesterday's paper for the first time that his early morning rehearsing had been the occasion for calling the police, but he admits that the hills are just the place for the display of oratory. He explains his choice by saying, "As I have the voice of an orator and hope in the future to be one, I felt that the seminary was not large enough to hold my remarkable voice, and chose the hills nearby." If the young man's abilities are judged by his modesty, we predict for him a large success as an orator.
