A statement from Washington shows New Hampshire fourth among the six New England states, ahead of Vermont and Rhode Island, in the amount of its savings bank deposits and number of depositors, and third, passing Maine, in the average amount of deposits; which is doing pretty well for a poor old bunch of rocks.—Concord Monitor.

Oh, fairly good. But Vermonters are not hoarders; they are investing some of their money in business and getting satisfactory returns on it.

We heard much during the state campaign about living up to platform declarations. We would like to ask if the proposed law which is being favored by the governor, lieutenant-governor and others, providing for the exemption of mortgages from taxation where the interest rate is not above 5 per cent, is living up to those same platform declarations? The platform recommended "changes in the laws that will equalize the tax of individual lenders of money and savings institutions, and urge that as far as practicable the ultimate benefit of such lowered rate be assured the borrower."

In view of the fact that England, the birthplace of vaccination, after a century of experience with it, has repealed the compulsory part of its vaccination laws, and that California in our own country has done away with her compulsory laws, it seems a little late for Vermont to propose to enact such an out-of-date measure. True, several states still continue such laws on their books. New York is one of them, and the "Open Door" relates this incident of a school girl in Buffalo: "When two public vaccinators and two policemen visited her school to inoculate the pupils with virus at $1 each, nine-year-old Lucille objected, saying she had been vaccinated, and if it must be done again she would go home to have it done. But she was threatened and force was used. Thirteen days later, and after ten days of suffering from blood poisoning, she died. Her mother lost her reason and was put in an asylum."

VERMONT'S REAL NEED.

In view of the recommendation made by the special-state commission chosen to investigate the need of a state tuberculosis sanatorium in Vermont, it is interesting to note that the state of New York has done far more than is asked of Vermont; instead of having a single state institution, New York passed a law in 1909 authorizing the establishment and maintenance of such an institution in each of the counties of the state, the expense to be borne by each county. Inasmuch as there are sixty counties in the state, it can be seen how far-reaching the law of 1909 will prove to be. Already according to information furnished by the American Medical Association's Journal, twenty-one counties have decided to build tuberculosis hospitals, and some of that number are now engaged in the work of construction; while it is hoped that before January 1 ten more counties will have come to the same conclusion, making at least thirty county tuberculosis hospitals. The New York state department of health and the State Charities association are instrumental in furthering this work, encouraging the counties to erect the buildings.

In planning the hospitals, the projectors figure the number of beds to be supplied as two-thirds the average of tuberculosis deaths in the county, the cost of construction being computed at about $500 per bed and the maintenance about $1.25 per day for a patient. The cost, as stated already, comes from the taxpayers of the counties and is, as the medical contemporary states, "insignificant in comparison with the sums the public pay for good roads and the reaction and maintenance of armories, orphan asylums, jails and prisons," whereas the money put into the county hospitals "will help to close up many an almshouse and many an orphan asylum; for this disease (the most deadly in the most productive period of human existence) is one of the greatest causes of pauperism, and probably the greatest single cause of orphanage."

These facts and statements are worth considering by the Vermont legislature now, when it is confronted by a proposition to spend a comparatively small amount for a second state tuberculosis sanatorium. We already have one institution for the treatment of this disease, located at Pittsford, and it is doing good work so far as its limited scope and accommodations will allow; patients in the incipient stages of the disease are being put through a course of treatment and training which, if started soon enough, enable them to go forth from the institution practically well-schooled and capable of taking their place among the bread-winners of the world and adding to the production of the world. But this institution at Pittsford, good as it is, does not meet all the requirements of the state; there is a erying need for an institution where patients in the more advanced stages of the disease can be cared for and where they can be removed from persons to whom they might communicate the disease. Indeed, more than one institution of this sort is needed, although the cases are not numerous enough in the counties to demand a hospital in each, and if the state will set the example by constructing one state hospital for care of these patients the subdivisions of the state may be induced to do something along the same line. It is only through this means that Vermont can hope to stamp out tuberculosis, or reduce it to a minimum. Therefore, the state legislature ought to enact a bill which may be introduced to cover the recommendation of the special commission, which has just reported to Governor Fletcher.

RIVER VOLUMES MEASURED.

United States Geological Survey Issues Report Containing Valuable Data.

The material progress of California has in large part been measured by its water-supply development. In the days of '49 its first great boom was the result of finding gold in a creek bottom, and throughout the early gold days the rapid growth of California was made possible by the development of water supplies for use in placer mining. In later years came the great irrigation activities, and especially in southern California have the agricultural products become so valuable that in that part of the state water is probably more than it is anywhere else in the country. Throughout the Sacramento and San Joaquin valleys water has the same relatively large values for irrigation. Still later came the recognition of the enormous importance of California water powers. In a very few years the development of water power has grown until California ranks second only to New York, the total installed horsepower in the state in the year 1911 being over 500,000.

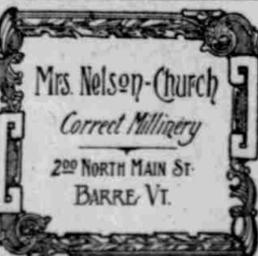

Importance of the Study of Stream Flow.

It is apparent that in a state so thoroughly dependent upon its water supplies investigations which will reveal the amount of water available in the streams and beneath the ground are of the highest importance. The people of California have recognized this and for many years have through their legislature co-operated with the United States geological survey in the determination of stream flow and the location of underground supplies.

Records Are Available to the Public.

The geological survey has just issued water-supply paper 291, on the surface water supply of the Pacific coast in California, 1910, by W. R. Clapp, F. F. Henshaw, and H. D. McGlashan. This report contains the results of measurements of some of the California rivers, made during the year 1910, at regular stations maintained by the survey in co-operation with the office of the state engineer. All the important rivers of the state were covered in this investigation, and in addition many smaller tributaries and irrigation canals. There are in all 98 stations for which data are reported in this publication, and work has been carried on in a way that affords for almost every stream reported a daily record of the discharge. A copy of the report can be procured free of cost on application to the director of the United States geological survey, Washington, D. C.
