"Old Fashioned Winter."

The old inhabitant was a good deal closer to the out-of-doors than his sons and daughters ever were. In winter there was no escaping the snow and avoiding the blizzard in the shelter of superheated homes and office buildings. Houses were warmed by grates and stoves, and called for regular trips to the woodshed, no matter how wild the weather or disagreeable the task.

The wind crept in, the snow whipped through the doors, the frost managed to drive his numbing chill through shutter and window pane. The old inhabitant knew what winter was and never held it in contempt.

That is why there is little chance of convincing the man who lived here forty years ago that the climate has not changed. He feels there must be some mistake or misrepresentation in the government figures. He finds the extreme difficulty in believing that the records show a more or less sameness in the winter season of a half a century ago and those of this period. Time, he is ready to argue, will bring the vegetation of southern origin, bound to advance into the north if the barriers of climate permit.

It is probably impracticable to report weather in terms of comfort and convenience. It is too bad that it cannot be. For then statistics would not come into conflict with memory and get the worst of the battle.—Concord, N. H. Monitor.

Needed No Sympathy.

The funeral was over, so Sinclair Lewis says. The elderly widower, having returned from the cemetery sat on the front porch of his small New Hampshire cottage, whistling softly to himself. A neighbor passed and saw the solitary figure in the shadow of the porch and halted his team. "Well, Uncle Gil," he said, striving to put sympathy into his tones, "how air you bearing up?" "Fust-rate, Eth," said the supposedly bereaved one cheerfully. "Dun't know as I ever felt better." "I thought maybe you'd be missin'—her," said the startled neighbor. "She was a good wife—tuckered her of your home and raised your children, and always done mighty well by you durin' all the thuddy years you lived together." "Yes; I know that," stated the widower. "She done all them things and I lived with her thuddy years, just as you was sayin'; but, god darn it, I never liked her!"—Saturday Evening Post.
