MODERN METHODS IN GIPSY AND BROWN-TAIL MOTH CONTROL

Use of Solid-Stream Spraying with Poison Solutions Increasing in New England.

The use of high-power spraying outfits for applying solid streams of liquid poisons is becoming more general in New England in the work of combating the gipsy and brown-tail moths, according to entomologists of the United States department of agriculture. By the use of such apparatus, woodland, park and street trees 90 feet and even more in height can be covered satisfactorily with poison solutions from the ground. When the usual mist-spraying outfits are used, the operators must climb the trees—a much slower and more expensive proceeding. The spraying of trees in New England, whether with mist or solid stream sprays, has been effective in combating the foliage-eating insect pests of the region. Arsenate of lead in the paste form is the poison generally used. Solutions of from 10 to 12½ pounds of the chemical to each 100 gallons of water are employed. Solid Stream Spraying. Spraying woodland by using this method requires about 600 gallons of spray solution per acre, and with a high-grade machine, properly equipped, an average of from 12 to 15 acres can be sprayed in a day. With the same outfit it is possible to treat about 400 shade trees per day and, as a rule, 400 gallons will cover about 35 trees. The cost of this treatment depends on local prices for supplies and labor. Early Spraying Best. The spraying of shade trees with arsenate of lead, say the entomologists of the department, should be accomplished as early a date as possible after the foliage has sufficiently developed. Early spraying is not only beneficial against the gipsy moth, but will poison many brown-tail caterpillars, as they are much earlier feeders than the gipsy moth. In the case of the elm-leaf beetle much is accomplished in poisoning the adult beetles, which do a small amount of feeding after coming out of hibernation before mating and laying eggs, as they are very easily poisoned at that time. Owners and operators of spraying outfits are warned by the department's specialists that failure to take proper care of their machines is responsible for most of the difficulties and delays that result during the spraying season. This is particularly true in regard to the precautions that should be taken when the spraying season is over and the machine is laid up for the winter. Other Control Measures. If the infestation of the gipsy moth is severe and the aim is to exterminate the pest rather than merely to hold it in check, egg clusters should be treated with cresote before spraying is begun. If infestation is in pasture land, proper precautions should be exercised so that live stock will not be poisoned. Poison notices should be placed in conspicuous places in all cases where spraying is done. From 800 to 1,000 tons of arsenate of lead and about 500 tons of high-power solid-stream machines are now used each year in the New England states in fighting the gipsy moth. Thousands of acres of orchard and woodland park trees, in addition to approximately 20,000 miles of street trees, are being sprayed. When spraying is properly done to control the gipsy moth, very little trouble is experienced with other leaf-eating insects.

No Coalition in Canada.

The Canadian government's decision to apply conscription has received a severe rebuff by Sir Wilfrid Laurier's refusal to enter a coalition cabinet. It was with the object of taking war questions entirely out of politics that the proffer of a coalition was made by the Conservatives, but apparently the olive branch was held out too late. A year ago there is no doubt that the Canadian Liberals would have joined cheerfully in any such plan for non-partisan action in making the system of voluntary enlistment a success. But they were not asked to do so. Sir Robert Borden and his fellow Conservatives held firmly to the reins of power and dispensed the enormous range of war patronage to quarters where it certainly did no harm to their own political friends. Now, however, the Conservatives are face to face with a new situation. The system of voluntary enlistment is no longer bringing in enough men to replace the losses in the Canadian divisions at the front. If the dominion is to redeem the pledge which it gave to England early in the war, the Borden government must get at least 100,000 men somewhere, and perhaps twice that number. Conscription seems to be the only way of doing it, and yet to enforce conscription upon 2,000,000 hostile French-Canadians is not an undertaking that one political party cares to assume single-handed. Laurier and his friends could help mightily with the masses of their compatriots if they set their hands to the task, but apparently they are not just now disposed to pick Conservative chestnuts out of the fire. Yet the Liberal chieftain is playing a dangerous game, since his action at this critical juncture may mean large defections from his own party in the English-speaking provinces. The Canadian Liberals may soon find themselves just where our own Democratic party found itself in the years succeeding the Civil war.—Boston Herald.
