GENERAL PURPOSE FOWL. White Wyandottes are Good Layers and Excellent for Table Use.

In an effort to produce a breed of fowls that would combine heavy egg-laying qualities with good table poultry qualities, in other words, a general purpose fowl, resourceful American breeders have turned out three great breeds—Plymouth Rocks, Wyandottes and Rhode Island Reds.

Of the several varieties of Wyandottes, the white is the most popular, not only among fanciers, but on utility farms. Its usefulness as a layer and for table poultry makes it popular with the commercial breeder. Many of these fowls have laid over 200 eggs per year. As table poultry, especially broilers, the Wyandotte is preferred, and they are readily adaptable as roasters and at other ages.

They have a full breast, small bones and maintain full flesh as they develop. The hens are remarkable layers of large tinted brown eggs. They become broody, sit, hatch and rear chicks, and make the best of mothers. The chicks are hardy and vigorous, grow rapidly and feather the quickest of all American varieties. When full grown, the males weigh from six and one-half to eight pounds, and the females from five and one-half to seven pounds.

All Wyandottes are acknowledged to be good winter layers; the white is considered by some to be the leader in this respect. The pullets reach maturity in from six to seven months.
