America and the Allies

The position in which the United States is put by the inability of the Senate to dispose of the treaty was illustrated in a trivial enough way yesterday at Madrid when a banquet was given at the royal palace in honor of the foreign diplomat.

That was sound, everyday common sense as well as shrewd political sense when C. H. Linn in speaking before the Republicans of Boston urged that the Massachusetts delegation go to Chicago as a unit and that it stand for Governor Coolidge.

As he said, there is every outward indication that this is to be a great year for Republicans in all state and national contests and it is a year that Massachusetts can be brought to the front in national politics.

Already Massachusetts has to its credit the man who is head of the Senate affairs committee, Senator Lodge, and the man who is head of the national House, Speaker Gillett.

As Mr. Linn testified, the people all over the North have heard favorable reports of Governor Coolidge and when ever a Massachusetts man visits a middle western city now or a far western city he is almost sure to be asked by some of the residents if he knows Governor Coolidge and all about his standing here at home.

Our governor certainly has become a valuable presidential candidate and he is now better known and more favorably known nationally than many men were when they received a presidential nomination.

He typifies the wise, sane, progressive and liberal-minded type of conservatism towards which the American people are looking as towards an ark of refuge from the failures of the present administration.

The one danger now to Governor Coolidge's cause as it is the one danger to the national Republican cause is over confidence combined with a return to power of the old standpat, arrogant and purse-proud group that once before saddled and bridled the Republican party and rode it to disaster and defeat in the last two national campaigns.

There are large and pivotal groups of voters here in the North who have hitherto not voted for Republican presidential candidates who to-day stand ready to do so if not driven away by too rigid a display of antique Republican standpatism. They may easily swing the election in one way or the other.
