One day's production of coal at the American mines this week made a mountain of 2,250,000 tons. Now watch us make it a molehill.

A dog at Geneva, N. Y., which had been richly endowed with Liberty bonds by its fond owner, is dead. Perhaps some hospital or some library, sorely in need of financial assistance, will get the endowment now.

The Democrats of Georgia seem to have placed their indelible stamp of disapproval on the act of Gov. Hardwick of that state in appointing an old woman to be United States senator in the short time intervening between the death of Senator Watson and the election to name a successor and immediately becoming a candidate himself for the nomination. Gov. Hardwick was soundly beaten in the primary. It was a kind of politics which the Democrats of that state could not stomach.

It has been found that Vermont, of all the New England states, showed an increase in acreage of improved farm land in the decade from 1910 to 1920, the Vermont rate of increase being three per cent, whereas the losses in the other five states of the geographical division ran as high as twenty per cent. It is disquieting that such a large territory as that in the New England division outside of Vermont should show a loss in improved land; but, on the other hand, it is encouraging that Vermont should show a gain because Vermont, being quite largely an agricultural state, would, perhaps, be the first to feel the effects of the swing back to agriculture and Vermont's trend may be indicative of a somewhat general movement that will become pronounced in the other states later on. From a purely Vermont standpoint, the statistics of the state are very satisfying.

GREENE AND THE POTASH DUTY.

Representative Frank L. Greene's address before the Franklin county farm bureau association at that organization's annual meeting in St. Albans recently was an interesting revelation into the inside machinery of Congress as well as a convincing defense of his vote in favor of a duty on potash, for which he had been called to task by some swivel-chair farmers and farm theoreticians. Greene had been criticized by these farm interests for that action, and it is worth noting that he went right to the farmers to make his statement. Therein, Greene displayed one of his distinct characteristics—the courage to go right before a gathering which might have hostile predilections in order to state his case. Yet his talk savored not of the pugnacious. Rather was it a plain statement of his action in voting for the duty on potash and on that he asked the farmers to judge of the merit of the situation. It is quite probable that many of the farmers of Vermont may not approve of the placing of a duty on potash but at the same time they will not be likely to condemn Greene completely because of that act. They know there is not a man in Vermont who is more loyal to the interests of Vermont than Greene. But Greene is not provincial to the extent that he sees only one side of the case, only one state in the union, only one interest or class in distinction from all other interests or classes; and when it comes to a choice of position he is rather sure to be found standing for what he considers the broadest good of the greatest number. That is the kind of a statesman that Vermont wants in Congress, wants in the Senate.

Possessions

Some men acquire great wisdom, other men gain many friends, and a few amass great wealth.

Most of us are content and thankful if we can get a little wisdom, a few friends and the tiniest bit of wealth.

We obtain the wisdom from experience, we win the friends by being friendly, and we accumulate the bit of wealth by saving and conservative investing.

The wisdom of experience has taught many that to make friends with this strong National bank helps them to accumulate their portion of wealth; first, because we encourage their savings and provide a secure place for them, and second, because we advise them how to make good investments when the savings have reached a suitable amount.

We extend to you a hearty invitation to join our circle of friends. We can help you, too.

"He Is Thrifty!"

Can they say this of you? The thrifty man is not a miser. He is thrifty not in the sense of being close-fisted, but in the sense of being progressive and enterprising. His thrift is the elimination of waste.

If more thought was given to the subject of thrift, millions would be saved that are now wasted.
