MORTIFYING RESULTS.

The Outcome of Edward Whittick Leaving His Fish Wagon in the Run.

Edward Whittick, a Davenport fish peddler—the police suppose—indulged too recklessly in fermentative extracts yesterday and became divorced from his navigation and thinking propensities. His foolhardiness in deserting the fish wagon, which was attached to a fence on Twelfth street and Eleventh avenue, for some length of time on a sunshiny day is sufficient evidence of something having interfered with his normal mental faculties. The result was mortifying—not alone to the contents of the vehicle, but to passers-by, who found it a relief to bandage their proboscis until the fish wagon was left a considerable distance behind. The police became acquainted with the circumstances, and in the evening detached the horse and placed it in a very barn, leaving the vehicle, which had become too strong to permit disturbance. This morning Whittick's employer inquired concerning his outfit, and was informed where the remains, except the driver, could be found.
