NOVEL FIRE PROTECTION

Water Screen to Keep Flames Fron Big Skyscrapers.

Representatives of big fire insurance companies doing business in New York watched a test recently of a new system to protect buildings from flames in adjacent structures. The experiment was made at the eighteen story Manhattan Life Insurance company building, 64 to 70 Broadway. The insurance company recently added to its standpipe fire plant what is known as the Regan water curtain, patented by

On the eighth and fifteenth floors on the Broadway side of the Manhattan Life building three and a half inch pipes were connected with the city water system in the street. The nozzles of the pipes were split into three tiny slots, so that the stream spread into a fine spray. This system of pipes stretched across the front wall of the building made a canopy of water, covered cash down, balance easy d zles of the pipes were split into three off in great streams for a block up and down the curb of Broadway. The plan is to turn on this system should there be a fire across the street and thus obviate any danger from heat or from a leap of flame across to the Manhattan Life.

A second canopy was turned on at the south side of the building, next to the nonfireproof Consolidated Exchange. A third system protected the rear, which touches on the New York Stock Exchange's New street side.

The only criticism made by the fire insurance men was that the force pump in the building, with its capacity of 500 gallons a minute, could not get water enough out of the Broadway main to make a sufficiently heavy canopy. The fire insurance experts said that if there were pressure enough the idea was an excellent one. Its cost was less than $1,000.

The use of the canopy of water in theaters to drench a stage in case of fire was looked upon as practicable.
