Flour Talks # 3

Maybe you do not know bread bakers work in flour mills. No, not in all flour mills. But in the mills where Occident Flour is made, bakers make bread every day.

We resort to every test that Science knows, to be sure the wheat we use is the very best hard wheat, to see that it is absolutely clean before the milling process begins, then to observe all those rigid requirements which are necessary to the production of perfect flour. But the final test—the supreme test—is the actual baking of bread, by our own bakers, from the flour we mill every day.

If, by any chance, any day's output of flour does not make bread such as the most discriminating housewife demands, then that flour never leaves our mills under the Occident label.

It costs a few cents more per sack to make Occident Flour than it costs to make ordinary flour. But the difference is worth far more than the small added cost. There is never any question about the absolute dependability of Occident Flour. If we weren't sure of the quality of every sack of Occident Flour we wouldn't guarantee it. But we do. Your grocer will refund your money if you are not pleased with Occident.
