Looked for Trouble and Found It.

A wood chopper living near Amador City wended his way to that quiet and inoffensive little village one day last week, and after making his necessary purchases endeavored to re-bottle a goodly share of the spirituous liquors that flow so freely at many places therein.

After becoming filled he proceeded, with pistol in hand, to hunt up some of the reputed bad men of the town and demonstrate to them that they were not in it with men of his class.

His first victim proved to be an old and inoffensive gentleman, whom he proceeded to intimidate by brandishing his pistol recklessly in his face, and at the same time telling what he was capable of doing and might conclude to do if the notion struck him.

At last, being informed by the old gentleman that he would behold him with his cane unless he ceased his harangue, he straightway left to look for more timid game.

After wandering for a time and insulting various people, he managed to land on a young Italian and sent him sprawling to the ground.

The Italian regained his feet and fled to other parts, but was followed up and once more made to measure his length upon the sod.

About this time a bystander who was referred to in uncomplimentary terms, took a hand and landed a right hook on the intruder's jaw, rendering him unconscious for several hours, during which time he was disarmed.

Upon regaining consciousness he was informed that union and non-union forces had united to rid the town of his presence; that the blow which he had received was struck before the combine was formed, and that a man was now being selected to deal him a punch that would render him unconscious for life.

He hesitated a moment, took in the situation, muttered something in woodchopper language and disappeared more mysteriously than he came, leaving the pistol behind as a relic of "what might have been."

Constable Tuttle arrived a few hours later, and after reviewing the case concluded that justice had been done, and no arrests were made. It is generally conceded that the man who struck the knock-out blow restored order in a business-like manner, and at a loss cost to the taxpayers than the most judicious justice could have done.

HEARSAY.
