CHILD LABOR BILL

The House Committee on Labor in Congress has voted to report the Palmer-Owen bill favorable with certain amendments. The bill prohibits interstate commerce in the products of child labor and is regarded as the most effective child labor bill ever brought before congress. Goods in the production of which children under 14 have been employed, in factories, or under 16 in mines or quarries, or in the production of which children under 16 have worked more than 8 hours a day, cannot be shipped into interstate commerce according to the bill.

The National Child Labor Commit tee is working for the measure and many state child labor committees, women's clubs, churches, and labor organizations, have signified their interest in its passage. The American Medical Association at its recent session at Atlantic City, drew up a resolution asking Congress to pass the bill. Those opposing the measure were given a hearing by the House-Committee but in spite of their arguments the bill will be reported fa-

But if congress will go after the northern sweat shops the southern mills will not suffer. The southern mills have never protested against a child labor bill that would be equitable, although they have appealed for a compulsory education bill to go along with it in order to keep children from running the streets wild, while the older members of the family are at work in the

DRESS IN SEASON.

Why should not the men in the south dress in fashion becoming the climate? This is a question often asked. Sometimes there is a revival of the old cottonade suits, and one mean many thousands of dollars to the farmers who attend, if they would take good advice and produce more mills at Spartanburg—the Calvert (Section 2). Mr. McCormick is now on his way here from New York, according to his take good advice and produce more mills at Spartanburg—the Calvert (Mr. McCormick). This is a question often daughter of John D. If we were to wear clothes made of our own cotton fabric, it would aid a great deal in finding a more steady market for cotton. Along the line of dressing in season, we find the following chatty editorial in the Fountain Inn Tribune

Most men feel that they are intellectually superior to women. While admitting that one of the gentler sex may cultivate her mind until it wil retain an unlimited number of facts and enable her to repeat parrot-like, the philosophy and logic born of male minds, they nevertheless feel assured that the ribad services of the services that the mind of man, in reasoning power, is fundamentally superior to that of woman.
