HUSBAND RESCUED DESPAIRING WIFE

After Four Years of Discouraging Conditions, Mrs. Bullock Gave Up in Despair. Husband Came to Rescue.

Catron, Ky.—In an interesting letter from this place, Mrs. Bettie Bullock writes as follows: "I suffered for four years, with womanly troubles, and during this time, I could only sit up for a little while, and could not walk anywhere at all. At times, I would have severe pains in my left side.

The doctor was called in, and his treatment relieved me for a while, but I was soon confined to my bed again. After that, nothing seemed to do me any good.

I had gotten so weak I could not stand, and I gave up in despair.

At last, my husband got me a bottle of Cardui, the woman's tonic, and I commenced taking it. From the very first dose, I could tell it was helping me. I can now walk two miles without its tiring me, and am doing all my work."

WHAT CRIMSON CLOVER DID TO THIS FARM

Feature Writer in The Country Gentleman Tells About Success with Cover Crop at Hodges.

Hearing of the wonderful success of Mr. Bob Hodges with clover at Hodges, in Greenwood county, The Country Gentleman, published in Philadelphia in the same plant with the Saturday Evening Post and Ladies Home Journal, sent a special representative there to write it up. The story, as it appeared in this large farm paper, occupied nearly two pages and was carried in the most prominent part of the paper. All of it is not printed here, but a part of it is printed to show the wonderful possibilities for the farmer who begins its cultivation. The writer of the article was Mr. Harrison Snowden Stabler and he says, in part:

A Banker-Farmer, Hodges is a banker-farmer or, I sh. I say, a farmer-banker for when he is called out into the fields back of his house he merely locks the front door of the bank and goes. Plus the hard-headed financial side he is gifted with imagination and some optimism for when I met him at the station after sun-down he had just finished fixing to go fishing for cats some six miles away. So it was that less than an hour later, sitting on the bank in the pitch dark, feeling for the bottom with my lead, I fished for Hodges' original idea—that thing wherein achievement is born.

"If you stay down in this country long enough," he said, "you will notice that every farmer has what we call a 'pet patch'. It's usually a small plot on which he puts all the manure he can get usually mighty little, too—as well as all the other fertilizer he can spare. Thirty years ago there was just such a patch immediately behind the house next to the store. It was a big one, two acres, and the owner was making a bale of cotton to the acre on it. I was fifteen years old then, clerking in the drug store when a drummer from the North noticed that cotton one day and said: 'I'd rather turn under a three-year-old clover sod on that land than have all the manure you could put on it.'

"It's funny how some things stick in your head. I remember replying that I would rather have a hundred acres like that than go to congress. The farm I own has been in the family and worked continuously for a hundred and fifty years. For fifteen years before I took hold it was worked by negro tenants, and it was as poor as land ever gets to be in this country. The first year I could not make more than ten bales of cotton with three mules—that is to say, on sixty acres, twenty acres to the mule. The second year I bought nearly a thousand dollars' worth of fertilizer for the sixty acres, and made only twenty-five bales on it.

"In the fall of that year I happened to be in Greenwood, and see in a store some crimson clover seed—thirty pounds of it. I couldn't imagine what it was doing there, for all the clover you could see here then was a little native white clover in a pet patch, with a cow feeding on it.

"But I remembered what that drummer had said, bought the seed and planted it all in September on three acres that I had manured. The following spring I got a fine stand and expected to turn it under for cotton. The ground got very dry by the time half of it was turned under, and I waited for a rain to do the balance. Before it came the clover went to seed. There was a big increase in the cotton on that three acres—more than enough for me to see that the clover was the real thing.

"Getting enough seed from the acre and a half of mature clover, I went right at it, putting my entire acreage under it the next year, and began to fight the hands, who thought I had gone crazy. I got a fair stand on seventy-five per cent of the land the first year without having put any manure on it. To this day, in patches where the clover won't make, I treat the land with stable manure. You may have seen poor land, but tomorrow morning I'll show you what we down here call 'real po' land.'"

His Method. The article then describes Mr. Hodges' methods, refers to the Crimson Clover Day at Hodges attended by progressive farmers from 10 counties and continues as follows:

"It's a curious thing," said I, "that in ten years your methods have not become widely known and generally adopted long ago."

"You've got to talk turkey to make a farmer change," Hodge laughed. "A funny thing happened when that crowd was here. I shot this into them: 'Four years ago I bought sixty-three acres of this real po' land next to me. It was worked by a white man, and was producing two bales to the plow—that is, to twenty acres. The first spring I sowed the entire acreage in cowpeas, gathered the peas let the vines lie 'til fall, chopped them up with a disk, and sowed clover right on top of it; turned the pe-vines and clover under the next spring and planted cotton.

"Seventeen acres of this cotton was planted by a negro who had owed the bank a hundred and fifty dollars for a long time. This man was in debt to pretty near everybody in the neighborhood in amounts varying from small sums up to sixty-five dollars. I put him on that land hoping to save that money he owed the bank. He was down and out, and he had to farm my way. He worked the place on shares I furnishing the land, stock and seed; he doing the work.

"On that seventeen acres he made fifteen bales of cotton. At twelve cents, that was sixty dollars a bale; the seed brought twenty a bale last season, and his part of the whole was about six hundred dollars. He paid off all his debts, put a hundred dollars in the bank, and has eleven dollars to his credit. The fertilizer bill was twenty-five dollars for acid phosphate.

"Here's the negro now," I said, "shoot some questions at him." Instead that crowd began shouting orders for clover seed until, to keep the meeting from breaking down, I had to tell them to send in their orders with checks when they got home. I am certain that I and my neighbors could sell a hundred thousand pounds of crimson-clover seed this season."

From the size of Hodges' mail-stacks of it—I do not doubt that statement in the least; but it was natural to wonder if all those farmers were going to switch their methods at once.

"No," he replied, "but most of them will, for they were the most up-to-date men from ten counties. Those that have better land than this was may get a good stand the second year if they stick to it. Those that have poor land, like this was, may get a poor or fair stand the second year, and a good stand the third year, if they stick to it. Others are going to quit the first year if their stand is poor, but they will simply be losing two or three years, because they will have to come to it sooner or later; that is certain."
