Love Eternal.

Love's breath is in the vernal breeze
That fans the cheek on twilight eves—
Love's breath exhales from out the rose,
When morn unfolds its crimson leaves—
Love's breath is in the murmuring sound
That o'er the bubbling fountain rings—
Love's breath is in the little song
The little bird to nature sings.

II.
Love's breath from yonder starry worlds
Comes down in her, pure and bright—
Love's breath is in the winter's storm,
And in the summer breeze of night—
Warm looks of love from nature's face
Alure me to her beating heart—
Lost in her fond and pure embrace,
My breast forgets its aching smart.

III.
Love's breath—it is God's holy breath
That unto thee, my heart, is given—
Whose gentle impulse, sweet and pure,
Doth softly raise thee up to heaven—
There shall that earthly plant put forth
Eternal flowers that ne'er shall fall,
Ah! I shall love!—and love!—and love!
Since love's but the life of all!

A TALE OF BORDER LIFE.

BY JOSEPH HENDERSON, M. D.

It was my lot, in early life, to be thrown into the society of some of the first white settlers of the Valley of the Juniata, and to hear many tales of the "hair-breadth 'scapes," and thrilling incidents which befel these hardy adventurers in the desultory warfare which they had waged with the aborigines of the soil, who, in their turn, for the wrongs inflicted upon them, sought no justice, when they well knew it was not to be found—but vengeance, uncompromising, bloody vengeance.

At the same time, there was not wanting many instances wherein these vindictive feelings gave place to more generous impulses, and the unhappy prisoner, destined for the stake and the faggot, was frequently snatched from the flames, to supply in some lone heart the place of a lost son, or a beloved daughter.

Whilst I have looked upon the Spring* which bears an imperishable name, near to which once stood the cabin of Logan, the veritable author of that simple and sublime appeal to the white man—in which the utter desolation of a broken heart is expressed, with a truth and pathos that has touched the lowest chord in the scale of human woe; or when the sound of the fall of a mighty oak, in the stillness of the wood, has recalled to mind the mournfully beautiful words of the dying Pushmataha—how have I regretted that so few anecdotes of these noblemen of nature have been preserved, and that many of the most interesting events of Border Life, which tradition had imperfectly handed down to the last generation, are destined to fade away from the remembrance of that which is to follow.

The ensuing narrative, in which I give the substance of what I heard related, deserves to be recorded as a rare example of disinterested love and chivalrous generosity, in one of a people, whom, in our youthful days, we were taught to look upon more in the light of savage beasts than rational beings, endowed, like ourselves, with the image and feelings of humanity. Mr. J. Hall, a Revolutionary soldier, and one of the first settlers of Huntingdon County, frequently related the following interesting incidents as having occurred within his own knowledge, and connected with the captivity and escape of a girl of the name of Brotherton, who had been taken prisoner by a predatory band of Seneca Indians, and carried to their settlements in our Northern frontier.

Two trappers on the Mushonnon were driven from their camp, near the present town of Philipsburg, by the advancing war party, and flying to the nearest settlement on the Juniata forewarned the inhabitants of the impending danger. The fearful tidings were carried by runners from house to house, and all, save Brotherton and his daughter sought the Block-house, at the Standing Stone, (now Huntingdon) The father being absent at the time, the heroic girl, resisting every entreaty, absolutely refused to leave the house until his return, which was every moment expected. And the rest of the family, consisting of the mother and several younger children, with the most gloomy forebodings, were reluctantly compelled to leave her behind. Brotherton did not return that night, and early the next morning the barking of the dog apprized her that some one was near, and supposing it to be her father, she went out to meet him—was seen, pursued, and overtaken by the Indians, who, already suspected that their approach had been discovered, from the circumstance that several houses which they had visited bore certain evidences of the hasty flight of their late occupants, and loading themselves with the plunder thus acquired, made a precipitate retreat through the mountains.

They were immediately pursued by all the disposable force at the Standing Stone, which Brotherton arrived in time to join. The party was headed by an old hunter, who, following the trail with the instinct of a bloodhound, came upon the place of their first night's encampment amongst the laurels of Tappan's Mountains. On the following day, in tracing their footsteps over some boggy ground, they remarked with pleasure that the slight shoes of Miss Brotherton (as they noticed with pain had been worn through on the preceding day) were now replaced by a substantial pair of moccasins. After this discovery, the leader of the party, a man experienced in the warfare and customs of the Indians, proposed a consultation, and addressing himself to Brotherton, the one of all the party the most deeply interested, advised him that on his daughter's account it would be the most prudent to give up the pursuit, as it was now evident that they ment to treat her kindly; that if overtaken, and finding themselves encumbered with the prisoner, they would put her to death rather than that she should fall into their hands. This prudent counsel happily prevailed, and they returned to the settlement.

Little is known of their proceedings afterwards except the instances related by Miss B., of their extreme vigilance and caution, to baffle pursuit and avoid surprise. Such as when ascending a mountain, if a stone was moved, they would turn round and re-place it; and in the stillness of the night, when a noise was heard, as of some one treading upon a dead stick, their pipes were instantly laid aside, and their fires put out, and not a word was spoken until it was light enough to resume their noiseless march.

Our heroine is represented to have possessed much rustic beauty, and attractiveness of manner, and although she had scarcely reached the full bloom of womanhood, previous to her captivity, more than one aspirant to her hand, had already paid his homage to her charms.

After remaining upwards of a year in the family of a chief, as an adopted daughter, Oron a distinguished young warrior, became deeply enamoured of her, and with every demonstration of the most ardent affection, offered her marriage.

His suit was mildly but firmly rejected.—Some time afterwards, he sought and obtained a private interview, at which he told her, he had plainly discovered that the White Dove, (a name by which he was pleased to distinguish her) loved the hills and the valleys of her own clear stream, better than the lakes and plains of the red man—and that she was pining at heart after the friends she had left behind her. That however much the rejection of his suit had grieved him, to be the daily witness of her unhappiness, distressed him still more. And that his object in seeking the present interview, was to propose a scheme for her deliverance.

After enjoining upon her the utmost caution that nothing in her conduct or demeanor might lead to a suspicion of her intended flight, he appointed to meet her at a well known spot a few miles from the village, on the midnight of a certain day. And to lull suspicion to rest, a few days previously to the appointed time, he intimated an intention, (a not unusual occurrence,) of taking a hunting excursion of several weeks duration.

Faithful to his engagement, the young chief, provided with every thing required for such an undertaking, set out with his interesting charge on the way to her log-regretted home. Nor did he relax, night or day, in the most unremitting attention to her comfort or convenience, throughout this long and dreary journey.

At night fall after kindling her fire, he spread her couch of forest leaves with the softest ponds of the fern, over which, upon the rude forks which his tomakawk supplied him, he erected a canopy of hemlock boughs, to protect her from the chilly dews of the night. A dressed bearskin and blanket afforded her all the additional comfort required after the fatigues of the day, to ensure her a night's repose at once profound and refreshing. When these simple preparations for the night were completed, he partook with her of the frugal repast which his knapsack or his rifle had furnished him, and then with the true delicacy of the most refined feeling, he retired to take the short repose which nature required, at a respectful distance.

It was near the close of September, on the last day of their weary march, that the warrior and the maiden stood upon the summit of a ridge which overlooked the cottage of her parents, the blue smoke from which could be seen curling upwards amidst the trees. Spread abroad before their eyes was a scene rich in picturesque and quiet. The last rays of the setting sun were resting upon the summits of the hills, whilst the deep valleys between were darkened in the shadows of evening. The soft low murmurings which rose upon the breezes were sent up by the beautiful Juniata, glimpses of which could be seen, as it flashed in light through various opening between the hills, until it was lost to sight in the dark defiles of the distant mountains. Pointing to the residence of her parents, the Indian thus addressed the fair captive:

"Oran can go no farther! The friends of the White Dove are still the mortal foes of the red man: She now stands amidst her native hills, and looks down upon the scene of her childhood, Oran would not have an unwilling bride: he has therefore brought her here, that she may make her final choice in sight of the wigwams of her people. Will she return with him to be the happy mistress of his heart, and home, or send him forth a lone wanderer into the wilderness?" Pointing to the setting sun, he continued:—"See! the Great Spirit of Light will soon hide his face behind the mountains, and the earth will be dark and sad: but tomorrow he will look again from the East, and all that live will rejoice in his beams. So, if the White Dove will hide her face, Oran's heart will be dark and sorrowful, and if she return not, the sun will again shine—but never more for him.

He then sat down and covered his face with his hands. Deeply impressed with gratitude for such disinterested love and generosity, in which there was perhaps mingled somewhat of a more tender sentiment, the maiden hesitated between the most conflicting emotion, which at one time inclined her to return with him, when the thought of her parents and their deep distress at the indelible disgrace of such a connexion* first caused her to falter in her choice, and finally to resolve on bidding adieu to her generous lover.

Oran received the announcement of her final decision in silence—nor did he again speak: she saw that he tried to speak, but could not. After pressing her hand to his throbbing heart, and pointing to the earth and to the heavens, he disappeared in the shades of the forest, and she never saw him more. Miss Brotherton never could relate this—the closing scene of her adventures—without shedding many tears.

Some years afterwards, when Commissioners were appointed by the State authorities to hold a treaty with the hostile tribes of the Six Nations for the ransom of prisoners, the father of Miss Brotherton, who felt grateful for the kindness of the generous Indian, and wishing to return him a suitable recompense, ordered a rifle to be made, in the construction and ornamenting of which, no expense was to be spared, and as Mr. Hale observed, it was just the kind of trinket an Indian would glory in the possession.

The rifle was sent out as a present from the young woman, with a friendly message to her quondam lover, to the effect that she would ever remember, with the most heartfelt gratitude, his generous devotion, and pray to the Great Spirit who was the common parent of both the white and red faces, for his prosperity and happiness, and that if they were never were to see each other again in this world, she trusted they would meet once more in those delightful ghodes provided for the good of all nations and colors in the world to come. But all how did she grieve to hear, that after his return from the Juniata, he appeared not as he was wont to do, but seemed gloomy and dejected, and soon afterwards fell, covered with wounds, in a reckless assault upon a camp of the Hurons, with whom his people were at war.

* No one not personally conversant with the first settlers can conceive of the horror and disgust with which such a connection was looked upon.
