THE DAY AFTER THE REVEL.

Roll, roll the pill of calomel,
And mix the subtle draught,
We've loved the Christmas feast too well—
Too much have cran'd and quaffed.
Ah! put my flannel nightcap on,
Bind up this aching head;
I'm not at home, mind, all day, John:
To bed, to bed, to bed!

Oh, gracious! that snap-dragon's snap
Is rankling very sore;
I've been a very foolish chap,
And won't do so no more.
Good Lindley Murray, pardon grant,
Thy ruler if I infringe;
Talk grammar, anyhow, I can't
With this stomachic twing!

Oh, turkey, beef, plum-pudding, mince!
Oh, brandy, wine and rum!
Next day what miseries, to convince
Your hapless victim, come.
Bring the hot water for my feet,
Take down grub, do—
Yah! I'd as soon be hanged, as eat;
Here comes my physic—Ugh!

FRIENDS AND FORTUNE.

Mr. Samuel Smithers, at the age of twenty-one, found himself in possession of freedom and fortune. A rich old uncle, who had acted as guardian on the death of Smithers' father, had brought him up in great seclusion at a country town a good many miles from New York. After a decent interval, the young gentleman came to the great metropolis to see a bit of life, and was, as might be expected, completely dazzled and bewildered by the splendors of Gotham.

One of his earliest visits was to Peale's Museum, where he failed not to be smitten by the charms of a dancer and singer, who, in all the glory of whitening, rouge, gauze and artificial flowers, pirouetted and warbled nightly to the admiration of a gaping crowd. Seeing herself the object of attraction to a young gentleman ostentatiously and richly attired, Miss Celestine Rigadoon addressed her notes and steps particularly to this unknown and very verdant admirer. He smiles his satisfaction; she replied by an answering smile; he threw her a bouquet she pressed it to her heart and raised it to her lips. Had it been possible, he would have declared himself upon the spot. As it was, he went to bed at the Astor, and dreamed of the enchantress, and the next morning called at her house, and obtained permission of her mother to pay her a respectful visit. Though Miss Celestine was ignorant and conceited, her charms completely blinded the poor young gentleman, and when he took his leave of her, he left his heart behind him.

On his second visit, he carried with him a Cashmere shawl, which was gratefully and gracefully accepted. At the end of the first week's acquaintance, he made her a present of a necklace of brilliants and a set of pearl ornaments, which cost him five thousand dollars. It was a very extravagant present, but then was not the lady destined for his bride? Three weeks passed away in ecstacy, and the deeply enamored youth was all the while screwing up his courage to propose. Though infinitely superior to the foolish and voluble creature who had enslaved him, he considered himself so vastly beneath her, that she inspired him with as much awe as if she had been an empress, at the very least.

What, then, was the astonishment, horror and grief of Mr. Smithers, when one morning the waiter handed him the following note;

Sir: It gives me great pain to inform you that you are an egregious dupe. Though a stranger to you, I could not witness the injury done a gentleman of character and fortune, without protesting against it. Miss Celestine Rigadoon, of Barnum's, who is now seeking to plunder and deceive you, is an arrant coquette. She is engaged to be married to a French barber in Chatham street, and will only pretend to favor your addresses so long as she can obtain money of you. I am prepared to furnish evidence of the truth of my assertions, and for that purpose will wait upon you about dinner time.

Respectfully, your friend,
Augustus Flasher.

Mr. Smithers' correspondent kept his appointment punctually. He was a young man of forty, with very black whiskers and a large amount of shirt-collar and jewelry, and stated that he was a commission merchant doing business in Wall street. His manners were exceedingly prepossessing, and after the infinite service he had done Smithers in opening his eyes to the mercenary character of Miss Rigadoon, Smithers could do no less than ask him to dinner. That evening they went to the theatre together, and the next day to the races on the Union Course. In short, they became very intimate, and Smithers, after having dismissed the false Celestine from his thoughts, blessed his stars for making him acquainted with an agreeable companion, a man of the world, and a true friend. Flasher taught Smithers to despise economy, got him a horse, dog cheap for five hundred dollars, bought tickets in his name for all the raffles going, and went with him to every place of amusement at his expense.

Flasher was engaged in a very flourishing business, according to his own account; but he soon developed a very singular mania for obtaining his friends' autographs. He required, however, something more than mere autographs; it was necessary that they should be appended to little slips of paper called checks, or something figured on the backs of written documents, all having reference to sundry sums of money to be converted to the use of the aforesaid Augustus Flasher.

Going on at this rate, it is not at all surprising that, after the lapse of a good many months, Smithers should receive a notice from the bank one morning, that he had overdrawn his account. At the same time several tradespeople presented their "little bill," a commercial term for very long accounts, with a polite request for immediate payment. Smithers sent his horse to Tattersalls, and then learnt for the first time that he was badly spavined, and not worth fifty dollars. He flew to his friend Flasher's, and found that gentleman was out of town. Several other intimate friends, whom he had obliged at various times, were conveniently absent when he called. After a desparate struggle to recall some of the scattered fragments of his fortune, Smithers in despair fled from the imperial city.

Some months after his departure, the following appeared in one of the Philadelphia papers: "Among the bold adventures who were among the first to explore the auriferous soil of California, a young man by the name of Samuel Smithers is particularly distinguished. Foreseeing the profit to be derived from the union of a strong will and undaunted perseverance, he has plunged boldly into the valley watered by the Sacramento, and there has employed himself in digging so successfully, that he has been literally heaping up gold. We are assured that he has detached blocks weighing more than eighty pounds. It is estimated that the young and adventurous Smithers, has, in three months only, amassed more than twenty millions of the precious metal."

This notice, copied into the New York papers, was the town talk for a week. It soon reached the eyes of Miss Celestine Rigadoon and Mr. Augustus Flasher, who were both astounded at the intelligence.

Some time later, the New York Herald contained the following: "Wonders will never cease. Young Smithers, formerly of this city, but now in California, is undoubtedly the richest man in the world. As astonishing as it may appear, he has found blocks of gold weighing four hundred pounds. Four hundred pounds! the imagination reels, astounded, before the prodigiousness of this fact. It is unquestionably true, however, that Smithers possesses not millions but billions. Satisfied with his success, he is about to abandon mining and return to New York to spend (a more conventional phrase, for his purse is bottomless) what he has acquired by his industry and enterprise. It is said, moreover, and here perhaps romance invades the province of sober history, that he returns to New York with the intention of marrying a young lady, the sincerity of whose attachment he once doubted. It is certain that he will neither meet with refusal nor levity. Happy Smithers!"

Later yet the same journal stated: "Samuel Smithers, Esq., the celebrated Californian, arrived in town to-day, and astounded those who knew his wealth, by the simplicity of his attire, and by engaging board at the Pig and Whistle in Chatham street, instead of one of the crack hotels. It is true, as we before hinted, that he has a love affair on the tapis. More in our next edition."

Smithers was smoking his cigar quietly in his hotel, when the door of his room opened, and Augustus Flasher rushed into his arms. "My dear fellow—welcome to New York. I forgive you for running away as you did. Allow me to congratulate you. Ah! we shall have many a good time together. But business before pleasure. You know I am indebted to you in the sum of five thousand dollars. You call that a trifle I know—but it was something to me at the time you advanced it. Here it is in current bank notes. Just count 'em and see if they are all right."

Smithers did so, and put them in his pocket with an indifferent air. A few minutes afterwards, the waiter brought him a large sealed package and a note. He opened the latter, and read as follows: "Dere, dere Mister Smithers,—I always loved you—so I did—and I most cried my eyes out when you deserted me and went off without never so much as biddin' me good Bi. But we went speke of troubles enny more. You've come back and we'd be very happy—won't we? But 4 dere's U should think me mercenary I send U them Dimonts and perles wot you give me a long while bak. Take bak the jewels but gif me wot I want ure true arts affeeshans. Yures tell deth

CFLESTINE RIGADOON.
"The artful mix" said Mr. Flasher, as he read the letter over his friend's shoulder. "She has dismissed the French barber, and now she thinks she has you sure. It was a sharp idea, sending back the jewels, but I hope you're not green enough to marry her."

"Not I!" replied Smithers—"I have got my eye teeth cut now, I assure you. I can read her and you too, Mr. Flasher."

Flasher laughed feebly as he encountered Smithers' eye—but he changed color.

"I've got back part of the fortune I squandered," continued Smithers—"and I mean to keep it. But before we part company, Flasher, I want to tell you a secret—I haven't been to California!"
