At the Opera House.

On Tuesday evening at the opera house Miss Florence Davis, supported by Mr. Elliott Dexter, presented the romantic comedy entitled "The Player Maid," to an audience that almost filled the house.

Miss Davis is a pleasing actress, and her support was most excellent, in fact each and every member of the troupe deserve mention for the splendid portrayal of the various roles.

The play was full of laugh producing parts, as well as having a more serious side, and the large audience was pleased with the production as was evidenced by the hearty cheers of approval and applause.

The costumes of the company were faultless and caused much favorable comment.

No POISON IN CHAMBERLAIN'S COUGH REMEDY.

From Napier New Zealand, Herald: Two years ago the Pharmacy Board of New South Wales, Australia, had an analysis made of all the cough medicines that were sold in that market. Out of the entire list they found only one that they declared was entirely free from all poisons. This exception was Chamberlain's Cough Remedy, made by the Chamberlain Medicine Company, Des Moines, Iowa, U. S. A. The absence of all narcotics makes this remedy the safest and best that can be had; and it with a feeling of security that any mother can give it to her little ones. Chamberlain's Cough Remedy is especially recommended by its makers for coughs, colds, croup and whooping cough. When taken in time it prevents pneumonia. This remedy is for sale by Ackerman-Stewart Drug Company.

A Gentle Servant

(Original.)

Colonel Collinwood commanded the 4th Hyderabad native infantry. The colonel was a large, florid man who well illustrated the English proclivity for not being able to learn from others. His father had been a small tradesman in London who in some way had put a member of the cabinet under obligation to him and the obligation was repaid by a commission for the son. Nearly all the young man's brother officers were gentlemen born, and many of them younger sons of nobles. Collinwood was snubbed for twenty years, and as soon as he was promoted to the command of a regiment commenced a systematic snubbing of every officer beneath him in rank excepting those connected with the nobility.

The colonel was especially hard on his servants. He seemed to consider any servant as a necessary evil and a native Indian servant as a worm of the dust. Among those who attended him were an Irishman named Malony and a native named Haroutune. Malony treated all natives as his master treated his inferiors. Haroutune was very different from both the colonel and the Irishman. He was as gentle as a woman. He was married to a soft eyed young Indian, and they had three children, on whom they both doted. They were very frugal, their one supreme object being to accumulate something for their little ones.

One day Colonel Collinwood missed a valuable diamond that he had bought, expecting to make a display with it when he returned to England. The only two persons who had access to the room where it was kept were Malony and Haroutune. The colonel, who had perfect confidence in Malony, had Haroutune arrested, and the courts in the neighborhood were so afraid of the autocratic soldier that he had little trouble in having the Indian convicted. Haroutune was sent to prison to serve a term of fifteen years.

Not long after the loss of the diamond Malony left the colonel's service to return to the British isles. Eight years later Collinwood, having been invalidated home, found his former servant living "in clover." Setting detectives on his track, the colonel unearthed the fact that he had disposed of a valuable diamond, and his prosperity dated from the sale. Collinwood, finding it in his interest to accept the remainder of the thief's fund on condition that he would not prosecute, made the compromise.

A few years after this the colonel returned to India with a wife and two little children. He debated the matter as to what he should do in making amends to Haroutune and decided that to say anything about the mistake would place him in an unpleasant position. Haroutune now had but a few years to serve. Besides, he was nothing but a low caste native, and a prisoner was as good a place for him as anywhere else. So the colonel concluded to do nothing in the way of justice.

Meanwhile Haroutune was languishing in prison. He was so gente in his manner that one of the prison officials took him into his service. This gave the poor fellow a great deal of liberty. Not long before his term expired a snake charmer gave an exhibition at the prison, and Haroutune saw him perform. Among other things, the snake charmer would place a bird in the same apartment with a snake. On its master's order the snake would steal up to the bird and strangle it.

One day when Colonel Collinwood was at dinner with some friends he remarked that the time for the expiration of the man who had stolen his diamond must have arrived. Some of the party said that the natives were prone to take revenge for punishment and it behooved the colonel to be on his guard. Collinwood declared that if he were inclined to fear any Indian he certainly would not fear Haroutune, who was more woman than man. Had the colonel realized that the prisoner, who had served fifteen years for an offense of which he knew himself to be innocent; that he had come out of prison to find his wife and children, having been deprived of his support, had succumbed and were all dead—had the colonel known this he might have feared that even a worm will turn. Mrs. Collinwood did not share her husband's want of faith in Indian revenge and shuddered at the thought of the poor fellow's fate.

The very next day Elsie Collinwood was found dead in the garden. The children were permitted to play there, since the place was surrounded by a high wall. The little brother who made the discovery said that he had seen a snake pass from a tree on to the garden wall. There was no mark on the body, though the throat gave evidence of strangulation.

A month later the boy was found dead in his bed with no more marks on him than had been found on his sister. The mother, on the verge of insanity at her loss, besought her husband to resign his position and return to England. He promised to do so, but before he could make his arrangements his wife had met a fate similar to that of her children. The distracted man followed her to her grave and completed his preparations to leave a country that had become a horror to him. The night before he was to sail he was awakened by a choking sensation and, grasping what was coiled about his neck, tore it away and threw it to the other side of the room. The next morning a servant went to awaken him and found his dead body terribly swollen. He had been bitten on the hand by one of the most deadly snakes in India.

The case of the six daughters of Robert Gilliland against the Board of Education of Buncombe county, North Carolina, came up for trial in the Superior Court at Asheville on Monday. They claim to be white children, but the board in excluding them held that they had negro blood in their veins and are not entitled to seats in the white schools. The people of the county are intensely interested over the case, and a number of the leading lawyers of Western North Carolina have been retained in the case.
